

The Court theatre 1904-1907

Desmond
MacCarthy

65.13
B

Harvard College Library

GIFT OF

FRANK EUGENE CHASE

(Class of 1876)

OF BOSTON

Ms. 465.13
B

Harvard College Library

GIFT OF
FRANK EUGENE CHASE
(Class of 1876)
OF BOSTON

The Court Theatre

1904-1907

A Commentary and Criticism

by

Desmond MacCarthy

With an Appendix containing Reprinted Programmes of the "Vedrenne-Barker Performances"

LONDON

A. H. BULLEN

1907

Rights of translation reserved

Thr 465.13

B

HARVARD COLLEGE LIBRARY
FROM THE LIBRARY OF
FRANK EUGENE CHASE
DECEMBER 3, 1920

TO

J. L. HAMMOND

CONTENTS

	PAGE
INTRODUCTION.—The Influence of Dramatic Criticism . . .	ix
CHAPTER I.—The Court Theatre—The Acting and Methods of Production— The Return of the Prodigal —Scenery— The Greek Plays—The Chorus—Summary of Plays . . .	I
CHAPTER II.—The Court Theatre Dramatists— The Convict on the Hearth —Mr. St. John Hankin— The Silver Box — Mr. R. V. Harcourt— The Voysey Inheritance — Prunella — The Campden Wonder — Votes for Women —FOREIGN PLAYS: Aglavaine and Selysette — In the Hospital — The Wild Duck — Hedda Gabler — The Thieves' Comedy . . .	15
CHAPTER III.—Mr. Bernard Shaw—His Characters—His Treatment of Emotion	47
CHAPTER IV.—The Shaw Plays and Performances— Candida — John Bull's Other Island — You Never Can Tell — Man and Superman — Captain Brassbound's Conversion — How he Lied to her Husband — The Man of Destiny — The Doctor's Dilemma — The Philanderer — Major Barbara — Don Juan in Hell	66
APPENDIX of Reprinted Programmes	121

NOTE

THE publisher wishes to acknowledge the courtesy of Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker and of their staff in helping to ensure accuracy in the reprinted matter contained in the Appendix.

INTRODUCTION

IT may sometimes depress the critic to reflect how little influence he has upon the fate of the plays and books he criticizes, but this fact is the salvation of criticism, and often, let me hasten to add, the salvation of art. If the case were otherwise, and the critic knew his opinion had a direct effect upon the commercial success of a play, he could hardly bring himself to point out carefully the defects of a performance, which he thought, nevertheless, far better than its competitors for public favour. He would feel bound, in such a case, to consider the immediate effect of what he wrote, and this pre-occupation would be fatal to criticism. Happily, we need not think of this. It is obvious that success is achieved independently of the opinion of critics; the sky is red with spreading, blazing reputations which their cold water is as powerless to quench as a fire-engine a prairie fire; nor can their unanimous praise always secure even a modicum of success. For instance, in March 1905, the Court Theatre Company produced a translation of Hauptmann's Bieber Pelz, called The Thieves' Comedy. It was a first-rate performance, and an exceptionally good play. The critics praised it with one accord; not only those who had begun to see in the Vedrenne-Barker management the most notable achievement in modern dramatic production, but also those who were reluctant to admit anything of the kind. They praised the acting, the play, the point ; they lavished on it those adjectives which are calculated to rouse curiosity ; but the play ran out after nine performances before almost empty houses. It is not likely, in the event of its revival, that it would again fall flat ; but that would be due to Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker having now gained the confidence of a considerable public, in securing which the support of even the most authoritative critics has only played an ancillary part. If, then, the public do not follow the critics, why do they read them ? That they do so is certain, since every daily and weekly paper continues to provide criticism in large quantities.

Dramatic criticism finds two kinds of readers ; those who just glance at the plot and the names of the "stars" to discover whether a play is likely to amuse them, and those who, equally or even more anxious to discover this, are interested at the same time in discussions upon the merits and meanings of plays. To the former, dramatic criticism is simply a species of elaborated, garbled news, less trustworthy than a hint from an acquaintance ; to the others it is an expression of opinion upon topics which they are in the habit of discussing themselves. If a critic is interesting they read him, but with no more subservience than they would feel towards a writer who was not a critic : the direct influence of criticism is therefore, in either case, likely to be small. Judging, however, from the prodigious quantity of talk exchanged over plays and novels, readers of the latter kind are numerous enough ; even allowing for the fact that conversation upon art and literature is one of the commonest masks that politeness finds for boredom. In France this fact is recognized, and interest at the back of all this general talk about the drama finds a better continuation in the Press. French dramatic critics are allowed at least twenty-four hours during which to examine and express their impressions, while our daily-paper critics are hustled into print an hour or two after leaving the theatre. It is they who are most widely read, while it is their work which is perforce most carelessly done. The deft and spirited Times may plunge into his subject at any point, and in a few energetic sentences reach the centre of his theme; but a combination of endowments including logic, quickness, and a fly-paper memory, which catches every telling phrase, is as rare as it is essential under such conditions. On the other hand, a critic may be capable of gathering a fair harvest of observation, without having the high-pressure mental machinery to reap and thresh it within a couple of hours, and such critics have now no chance of doing their best. Consequently they are in disgrace in all quarters: managers talk as though they would gladly be rid of them; actors are sick of finding their acting dismissed in a few vague phrases at the end of an account of the plot, their strokes of imagination unnoticed, their bungling carelessly praised; authors complain that their plays are misunderstood—Mr. Shaw frequently writes prefaces to show they are dunder-heads; their editors cut them down, their readers think they could do better themselves. All this would surprise nobody who had seen a first-night rush back to newspaper offices, where copy is often snatched away in the writing, and the time allowed commonly varies from forty to a hundred minutes. So driven, a man will usually find himself writing, not what he would most like to express, but whatever he can put down quickest. The remedy is simple: the editors must be persuaded to accept a brief "report" of the first night and to hold over the critical account of the play till the following issue; or, better still, for a weekly feuilleton. It would pay them well: they would be getting far better copy; they would please a section of the public they never cease to cater for by literary articles and reviews of all kinds, while they would be providing the people, who choose their plays by rules of thumb, just the prompt, ungarnished news they require on the following morning. That it would be an advantage, from the point of view of the theatres, if critics were enabled to write their best, may seem in contradiction with the fact that criticism has little direct influence; for it is certainly true that the sale of tickets depends upon the taste of the public, and not upon the taste of the critic; but criticism has nevertheless a strong indirect influence: an example can be taken from the history of the Court Theatre.

In accounting for its success, after you have pointed to the originality and power of Mr. Shaw's plays and the intelligence and naturalness of the acting, further explanations may seem as superfluous as Harlequin's thirty-six reasons why his dead master could not appear; yet if we do seek further, the influence of ten years' criticism upon public sentiment, during which the most entertaining critics assaulted the stock London play, laughed at its hackneyed situations, its vapid sentiments, exposed its reach-me-down solutions and superficial problems, must be taken into consideration in accounting for the difference between the success of Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker and that of such intermittent enterprises, so similar in spirit, as the Independent and New Century Theatres.

Beside the comparatively few people who knew all along what they wanted from the theatre, there were a large number who knew vaguely what they did not want, but were inclined to explain their constant dissatisfaction by telling themselves that they were not naturally fond of the drama. The few who knew what they wanted went to the Independent and New Century Theatres, or joined the Stage Society; the others, without being convinced completely, began to be persuaded, by such critics as "G. B. S.," "Max," Mr. William Archer and Mr. Walkley, that there might be the best reasons for their lack of interest in the average play. When in 1904 the Court Theatre started under a new management, the enterprise this time did not wear the truculent, propagandist aspect of the Independent Theatre; Ibsen was no longer a bugbear, though he was far from being a draw; the plays of Mr. Shaw had been widely read, and there was considerable curiosity to see them; Arms and the Man and the few performances already given of You Never Can Tell, The Devil's Disciple, and Candida had been remembered and talked about; and, moreover, Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker had the good fortune to produce, as their second play, John Bull's Other Island, which attracted all sorts and conditions of men. Society, on the eve of a general election, came to laugh at Broadbent, and to listen to brilliant discussions upon Irish and English character. They sat enthralled through a play with no vestige of a plot, delighted by acting unlit by the light of "a star," which was obviously and incomparably the better for that. Here, too, they found a play the roots of which struck among the interests of the time, which presented types of character delightfully recognizable, yet new to the stage, in which a most natural sequence of events carried them along like a series of ingeniously contrived surprises, and left them with plenty to think over, laugh over, and dispute over when the curtain fell ; in short, here was a new play full of qualities which the critics had been arraigning the London stage for not possessing. No wonder when the question of going to the theatre next came up people should ask themselves what was being done at the Court.

Thus in an indirect way these critics, who were so amusing to read, had prepared the public to see the significance of the new management ; and though it cannot be supposed that were this suggestion, for giving the majority of critics more time, taken up, the result would be a rich crop of remarkable criticisms, certainly the discussions upon the merits and defects of plays would be henceforward much closer, and the articles proportionately more interesting to numbers of people. It is of small consequence that a critic should damn a good play ; but it is of consequence that the feeling which criticism promotes should be that plays are well worth discriminating upon, since only in such an atmosphere can drama flourish. Criticism may miss the point again and again ; but provided it is of the kind which stimulates impartial scrutiny and interest in the minds of those who concern themselves with works of art, it has fulfilled its main function both as regards art and the public.

THE COURT THEATRE

1904-1907

TOUCHSTONE. Wast ever at the Court, shepherd ?

CORIN. No, truly.

TOUCHSTONE. Then thou art damned.

As You Like It, Act III, sc. 2.

THE COURT THEATRE

1904—1907

CHAPTER I

IN 1904 the Court Theatre was in the hands of Mr. J. H. Leigh, who at the time was giving a series of Shakespeare revivals. Mr. Vedrenne was his manager. In February of the same year Mr. Granville Barker, who had produced several plays for the Stage Society, was asked to superintend the production of The Two Gentlemen of Verona. He undertook to do this on condition that Mr. Vedrenne would join with him in giving six matinée performances of Candida. The proposal was readily accepted, and out of it grew the permanent alliance between them, which has had such important results.

The closest parallel to this joint enterprise is, perhaps, the starting of the Théâtre Libre, in Paris, by M. Antoine, in 1887. In their aims, in their immediate influence upon the drama, and in their successes, these two enterprises have had much in common, though their beginnings were different. M. Antoine began acting before small audiences of subscribers, who were either scoffers or enthusiasts, plays which only ran for three nights; the Passage de l'Elysée des Beaux Arts, where they were performed, was a mean-looking little alley, with nothing propitious about it except its sounding name; in fact, the only advantage that M. Antoine had at the start was his freedom from the censor's interference. The points of resemblance between the two enterprises are that both succeeded in getting the public to appreciate a more natural style of acting, that both were practical protests against the tyranny of the "well-constructed play," that both produced their plays for short runs, and, lastly, that both very quickly collected round them a new school of young playwrights. In each case the same principle lay at the back of their successes and their influence; namely, a determination to get away from what was artificial and theatrical in methods and traditions, and to get back to actuality in gesture, diction, and sentiment. M. Antoine, however, had the more rigid tradition to contend against; Mr. Barker's way had been smoothed by the Independent and New Century theatres, and by the Stage Society. His public was familiar with Ibsen's theory of the stage as a room with a wall knocked in to allow the spectators a view of the interior; while the French public laughed whenever M. Antoine turned his back on the audience.

At the Court the acting pleased from the first. People began to say that the English could act after all, and that London must be full of intelligent actors, of whom nobody had ever heard. Yet, strange to say, these actors, when they appeared in other plays on other boards, seemed to sink again to normal insignificance. The truth was that the Court Theatre acting, which was so much admired and talked about, was only a part of a general theory of dramatic production, which was carried out at every point with the most stringent consistency.

The aim of the management throughout was truth as opposed to effect. The ideas which regulated every detail, decided the importance of each scene and the prominence of each character was a recognition of the truth that in order to make others feel you must feel yourself, and to feel yourself you must be natural. This not only implied that actors had to be carefully chosen to fill parts which they could sympathize with and understand, but that every speech, dialogue, and scene had to undergo beforehand the criticism of rigorous common-sense; in fact that the whole play had to be tugged at and tested in rehearsal until the coherence of its idea and the soundness of its sentiment were perfectly established. Now that is not the usual process of production; what happens in the majority of cases is rather this. A prominent actor takes a fancy to a play, because it contains a part which promises him opportunities for bringing off some of his most celebrated effects. He may be aware that there are very weak passages in it; he may feel even in his own part the ground quaking under him at every step; but he knows that his manner is inimitable in a certain scene—say, one in which he pardons an erring woman,—and he relies on his manner, his peculiar knack, or his personal magnetism to carry it off and prevent the audience from feeling the flimsiness of the sentiment or the improbability of the situation.

But the weak places are still there, although the principal scene may be safe in the hands of the “star,” and the problem of the producers becomes, how to disguise them as much as possible. I am not discussing here the inevitable consequence of the Actor-manager system, which compels the leading actor, who knows that he is the principal attraction, to make his part as prominent as possible and everything lead up to his scenes, even to the detriment of the whole play; but a method of production which affects not only the proportions of the parts, but the manner of acting them. This method is the one of disguising sham sentiment and incongruous utterances by teaching the actors to "carry them off;" so that the art of acting becomes in many cases the art, not of reproducing emotions, but of behaving in such a way that the audience is astonished into not noticing whether the acting is good or bad, or whether the emotion expressed is true or false. The practice of the Court Theatre management has been exactly the reverse of this. The players have been trained not to "act" in this sense. The surprisingly good quality of the acting has been mainly due to the fact that the producers have taken pains to see that the actors should have nothing inane or affected set them to say and do; and that the parts should be capable of being acted well, that is to say, naturally and sincerely, from beginning to end. Imagine the predicament of an intelligent actor, who is trying to make a human being out of his part, when he finds that he has to "carry off" some scene or speech which has no vital connection with the character he represents! He must go through with it, he must give it an artificial lift of some kind or other; yet, in doing so, he must make nonsense of the character his art has constructed by means of a hundred little touches of imagination. If you make a man knock the bottom out of his own work in this way, of course he ceases to put his heart and imagination into it. So the main cause of stockishness and lack of imagination among actors is, in the end, the lack of any critical interest in the managers themselves. They have no artistic faith; they are interested, not in human nature, but in dramatic effects; they prefer plays which "show power;" and in consequence they are obliged to train their actors and themselves so as to disguise the weaknesses of such plays, and to avoid natural acting for fear of challenging in the spectator a standard of reality.

Another point with regard to the Court Theatre performances which was quickly noticed was the excellence with which the minor parts were performed. Every actor apparently was willing to accept the smallest part, however marked his success in longer parts might have been. It was worth his while to do this because the producers were careful to leave as much room for him in his scene as the construction of the play allowed. They were absolutely unhampered by either the desire or by the obligation of the actor-manager to make the interest of a performance centre upon one or two characters; with the result that the Court Theatre has been practically the only theatre where it has been worth an actor's while to play a small part, and where the playwright's intentions have been absolutely respected. To take one of many examples. Mr. Edmund Gwenn had made a hit as Straker in Man and Superman; when next he appeared he was Baines, the butler, in The Return of the Prodigal. He had very few words to say, and he was only on the stage for a few minutes. They were not minutes which were crucial to the development of the story, but they were made important by his imaginative acting. The principal figure, the Prodigal himself (Mr. Matthews), was his interlocutor; but nevertheless as long as Baines was on the stage he was the centre of interest. Not because he out-acted Mr. Matthews, but because his remarks were, at the moment, the most important means towards creating the atmosphere which the author had intended to produce.

About eleven o'clock, the morning after the fainting Prodigal has been found on the door-step, Baines, while clearing away his late, lazy breakfast, begins to discuss with effusive, yet duly respectful interest, his young master's narrow escape from perishing the night before. The Prodigal, whose fainting was a ruse to secure a warmer welcome, naturally discourages an interest in his dramatic return home, and proceeds to ask a string of questions about his industrious and blameless brother and his father's parliamentary prospects. The answers enable him to see how the land lies; but the dialogue was made interesting by the butler's manner, which became at once discreetly and regretfully self-effaced, when he received no encouragement to be sympathetic. Mr. Michael Sherbrooke's Marzo in Captain Brassbound's Conversion was an instance of perfect success in a small part, though, unlike the former, not an example of the actor's art of creating a character from a mere hint of the author. He had not a half-dozen lines to speak, yet by becoming so perfectly the childlike Italian rascal, he diffused reality all round him, and by his desperate interruption, when Lady Cecily in the trial scene is referred to as a lady—"She no lady. No lady nurse dam rascal. Only saint. She saint"—he drove home the romance of her practical, universal kindness as effectively as Miss Ellen Terry's voice and sweet good-natured manner in the leading part. When will the other London managers learn that the dramatist who is worth his salt needs the co-operation of every part, however small, in order to drive his meaning home ; that we want to see plays, not to have our attention riveted perpetually on the same personality for three hours at a stretch ? Besides, it is largely by seeing the effect of a personality on others that we come to feel its force, and if the other characters on the stage with the principal figure are not felt to be real people, this reflection of him in their behaviour must be vague and unreal. A leading actor, who is to impress us, must be surrounded by other actors in their way equally convincing ; otherwise all we gather from the performance is that he knows his business better than his cast, which as often as not is a poor compliment, and not worth paying half-a-crown to verify.

There is another point which London managers persistently overlook, that good acting can make poor scenery seem real, but that real scenery cannot do the same for poor acting. The Court Theatre had no spare money to lavish on the setting ; but who missed the luxurious drawing-room interiors, the silver inkstands on the writing-tables, or the solid bookshelves filled with indubitable books ? As every reader of novels knows, if once the novelist has made his heroine speak rightly he can spare a description of her beauty ; if he can transmit the emotion of the moment he need only say the sun was up, for his figures to stand in the glances of the morning and the birds to begin to sing in the woods : it is the same with acting and stage properties. Lady Macbeth may drink to the health of her assembling guests from a gilded marmalade pot, if only she raises it properly to her lips, with as much effect as if she drank from a cup copied from a museum treasure.

Sometimes pictorial beauty, however, does help to enforce the sentiment of a scene ; but as a rule the simplest means, harmony of colours and agreeable lights and shadows, do this best. When the scene is a strange one it may be necessary to vivify the imagination through the eye, or, in a poetic play, to stir by sights and sounds a contemplative mood in the spectator. The old theory of scenic presentation was to aim at broad effects. This has been supplemented by the practice of crowding the stage with every conceivable property of the most realistic and costly description ; but any one who saw the Japanese players when they were here six years ago, or the performance of Salome, given by the Literary Theatre Club last summer, or Don Juan in Hell at the Court Theatre a few months ago, will feel that a few well-chosen details go further to create a scene than all the usual resources of lavish London management. Moreover, the atmosphere created by the suggestion of a few details, beautiful in themselves, harmonizes more subtly with that which the words create as the play proceeds. Elaborate scenery, however splendid, is, and must remain, a portentous matter of fact ; while a scene which is suggested takes significance from all that happens, for it is formed itself out of the spectator's imagination. Scenery of this kind is therefore the only proper setting for a poetic play. In the revivals of Euripides at the Court Theatre, hardly enough attention was paid to setting of this kind. In the Hippolytus the stage was hardly worth looking at; though in the Electra the log hut, seen in the cool dusk of morning, with the cypresses standing round it like black candle flames and glimpses of sky beyond and between them, did induce a mood of grave expectancy, befitting the play which was to follow.

These revivals of the Greek drama have been a very important part of the Court Theatre programme. Next to Mr. Shaw with eleven plays comes Euripides with three, on the list of their achievements. As a chronicler and commentator upon the remarkable work of these two and a-half years, I am at a disadvantage in dealing with these Greek plays, having missed the performance of The Trojan Women, which was thought far the most impressive of the three. People still talk of Miss Gertrude Kingston's Helen as a piece of acting to treasure in the memory; and readers of the play who considered it contained a too great monotony of sorrow to be effective on the stage, found themselves, to their astonishment, almost unendurably moved. There are no scenes in the Elizabethan drama more terrible than this play itself; there is nothing to equal it for prolonged tragic suffering, for bitterest pathos, or for the sense it inspires of the cruelty of men.

The heroes of Troy are dead when the curtain rises, and their wives are at the mercy of their conquerors and about to be borne away as slaves and concubines. They weep for their children torn from them, for their dead husbands, and for the terrible fate before them; their lamentations are addressed to each other or to the faithless gods, and over all hangs the sense of an implacable fate.

Andromache's last remaining son is taken from her and killed, for fear he should grow up to be the avenger of his house ; Helen is delivered over to Menelaus that he may glut his revenge upon her. She is the only one of these women who shows no loyalty or true dignity under calamity. She lies to her husband, saying that she left him against her will, and meets him with ironic effrontery, confident in the power of her radiant charms—well justified indeed, for he takes her home.

The play was performed, in the opinion of the discriminating, with a dignity which made the prolonged exhibition of such sufferings tolerable and beautiful.

In the performance of the Hippolytus Mr. Granville Barker's delivery of the messenger's speech was the most memorable feature ; in the Electra, the spirit in which Miss Wynne-Matthison acted the half-selfless, half-personal passion of Electra herself, and the gravity and beauty of Mr. Lewis Casson's delivery of Castor's speech at the end of the play.

It will be well to state, before going any further, what the aim of the Court Theatre management has been in reviving these Greek plays. Mr. Gilbert Murray's rare and beautiful translations of Euripides proved that, in the hands of a poet and a scholar, the old Greek dramas could be refashioned into plays, which the English reader might enjoy and understand with the same close, effortless sympathy with which he might follow the work of a modern imagination. The performances at the Court Theatre were attempts to carry this feat of transfusion one step further ; Mr. Murray had turned Euripides into an English poet-dramatist ; Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker tried what could be done towards naturalizing him on the English stage.

Now there are three courses open to those who would present revivals of ancient drama.

One method of success lies in keeping the modern spectator conscious all the time that what he is looking at requires, if it is to be understood and appreciated, a change in his ordinary ways of feeling and judging. The actors, in this case, must aim at archaic dignity; they must stand, move, and speak in such a way that the spectator is perpetually conscious that the effect sought is different from the impression which modern drama would seek to create in such a scene. This is the safest method; it is, too, the simplest by which actors can be got to efface their own personalities, so important a condition in the conveyance of simple and tragic emotions.

The second method, one more tempting and more ambitious, is to supplement the conventions of the ancient stage, which now leave us cold, with modern means of rousing emotion. The Greek Chorus is a convention emotionally unintelligible to us; this second method would add to the utterances of the Chorus the majestic harmonies of tragedy and the music of fear and hope. What a splendid opportunity there is for a triumphant burst from the Chorus at the close of the recognition between Electra and Orestes, one of the most passionate meetings in all drama, or when they rejoice over the death of Ægistheus! With music the Chorus would become to us what it was to the Greeks, a sounding-board to emotion and a means of increasing the spectators' sympathy with what was happening on the stage.

But the Court Theatre chose the third and most difficult method; that of acting the plays as though they had been written for the modern stage. They had no wish to succeed in an æsthetically archaic performance or in an archæologically sentimental revival, and, on the other hand, the introduction of music, by drowning the words, would have hindered their main object, which was to deliver the whole play as it is across the foot-lights. Euripides is so much in sympathy with our way of feeling character and emotion, that it is particularly tempting to bring out the significance of the situations and dialogue by acting them with modern expressiveness. But supposing the managers right in their choice, their treatment of the chorus was very damaging to these plays. On the French stage they have, in some similar revivals, reduced the Chorus to a rudiment, to two venerable old men, one each side of the stage, repeating their speeches alternately. This was very unsatisfactory, but it is doubtful whether it could be more unsatisfactory than the Chorus at the Court. There it was represented by seven or eight ladies, who moved about with slow, elaborate caution, posed like tableaux vivants, and uttered the most various sentiments in a monotonous and lugubrious chant, tapering into dismal contralto notes, and conveying no definite emotion, beyond suggesting the earnest desire of the performers themselves to do their best. These lilting sounds were so unfamiliar and mournful, that an allegro movement took no effect. The chorus was started off by the leader touching a chord upon a harp, and when she had to speak by herself she always spoke in this artificial manner, even when what she said should have come like a cry from a spectator moved beyond control by sympathy or suspense. For instance, before Electra has recognized her brother, when the chorus is almost certain it is he, the leader exclaims, "O, never was the heart of hope so hot within me," or, after the murder of Clytemnestra, when brother and sister are overcome with horror at what they have done, she calls out, "Dire is the grief ye have wrought:" these words should sound like excited cries from a spectator deeply stirred, and never spoken in a voice artificially pitched. For whether the Chorus is the "ideal spectator," or whether they belong more to the stage than to the audience, they are certainly a body of people in a high state of interested excitement; and if they are to add to the interest of the play itself instead of detracting from it, the Chorus on the modern stage must be represented by people who utter their comments, whether they be reflections or passionate expressions of pity or rejoicing, like people naturally moved. In their treatment of the Greek Chorus, Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker seem to have lapsed for the first and only time from their guiding principle of production. A chorus of men would probably be more effective; for the voices of men speaking together are much more impressive, and they look and move far better than women in the Greek dress, who for some reason or other appear self-conscious.

Before considering the performances in detail it will be well to review at a glance the work of these two and a half years.¹

¹ For dates and the number of performances given of each play, see Appendix.

Shaw	eleven plays .	Candida. John Bull's Other Island. How he Lied to Her Husband. You Never Can Tell. Man and Superman. Major Barbara. Captain Brassbound's Conversion. The Doctor's Dilemma. The Philanderer. Don Juan in Hell. The Man of Destiny.
Euripides	three plays .	Hippolytus. The Trojan Women. Electra.
Ibsen	two plays .	The Wild Duck. Hedda Gabler.
Hankin	two plays .	The Return of the Prodigal. The Charity that Began at Home.
Hewlett	two plays .	Pan and the Young Shepherd. The Youngest of the Angels.
Barker		The Voysey Inheritance.
Housman, Barker, and Moorat . . .		Prunella.
Galsworthy		The Silver Box.
Hauptmann		The Thieves' Comedy.
Elizabeth Robins		Votes for Women !
Schnitzler		In the Hospital.
Robert Vernon Harcourt		A Question of Age.
Cyril Harcourt		The Reformer.
Masefield		The Campden Wonder.
Maeterlinck		Aglavaine and Selysette.
Fenn		The Convict on the Hearth.
Yeats		The Pot of Broth.

No one can help being struck by the number and variety of these plays ; no other modern managers have given so many memorable performances in so short a space of time.

CHAPTER II

THE young dramatists, whose plays have been performed at the Court, differ from each other in so many respects that they cannot be readily classified. There is, however, one broad distinction which can be made between some and others. The work of Mr. Granville Barker, Mr. Galsworthy and, in a lesser degree, of Mr. Hankin shows a critical, dissenting attitude towards contemporary codes of morality ; while, on the other hand, Mr. Robert Vernon Harcourt and Mr. Cyril Harcourt and Mr. Fenn take the world as a going concern. Mr. Granville Barker's treatment of a case of conscience in The Voysey Inheritance is distinctly subversive. The moral is that embezzlement with the view of straightening out a crooked state of things may be the right course for a young man who finds himself heir to a business founded on fraud ; in fact, the whole play is directed against the notion that questions of right and wrong can be decided by rules of thumb. Mr. Galsworthy's play The Silver Box is an attack on the injustice of our present social machinery. The play presents two instances of exactly similar offences, the one committed by the idle good-for-nothing son of a rich man, the other by a surly, unpleasant, but by no means despicable workman, and shows how the former escapes and the latter is punished. The great merit of this play is the complex exactness of the parallel between the two cases, which nevertheless is so unobtrusively drawn that the fact that there is a moral only occurs to the spectator during the last act; this is the highest compliment which can be paid to a play with a purpose, that the moral is not perceived till the end.

In the case of Mr. Hankin it is more difficult to show that there is anything of the reformer about him; but certainly the distribution of sympathy in The Return of the Prodigal is not conventional. In that play he puts forward a good case for a real ne'er-do-weel, who has about him no touch of the stage romance which usually surrounds such a character.

On the other hand the man who has the beau rôle in Mr. Fenn's Convict on the Hearth, is an East End parson who makes everybody happy by the most approved methods of cheerful Christian sympathy. It is an amusing, friendly, touching little piece; but with no more criticism of current ideas in it than there is in The Christmas Carol. Both Mr. Harcourts take the world of fashion as they find it, and they find it—simply very amusing.

In spite, then, of the preponderance of Mr. Shaw and the presence of Ibsen in the play-bills, it cannot be said that the Court Theatre represented only one movement of thought, even were the classical plays and such romantic plays as Pan and the Young Shepherd, Aglavaine and Selysette, and Prunella are set on one side. But it has represented an æsthetic and dramatic movement of remarkably wide sympathies. Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker have produced a number of plays which have been attacks on current ideas, and they have produced others in which the morality is of the customary type; they have produced plays so unconventional in form and construction that no other manager in London would look at them, and plays such as The Reformer, by Mr. Cyril Harcourt, which in method and tone resembles the ordinary society play. Whatever was good of its kind was given its chance, but the number of the plays without what is considered a good construction among them is a significant fact. If the æsthetic influence of the Court Theatre upon the modern drama were capable of being summed up in a sentence, the truest summary would be that it has expanded enormously the conception of what kind of story is suitable for the stage; in short, that it has enlarged the meaning of the word "dramatic," for that adjective signifies nothing but a quality in actions and persons which would make them impressive on the stage. It used to be held, and is still very generally believed, that the plot was the most important part of the play. The playwright constructed his plot and then made the characters as real as he could within the limits it allowed. He proceeded along certain recognized lines. The first act, and sometimes the second act as well, was employed in drawing the characters and indicating their surroundings in such a way that there was no need to return to them again; the intrigue or plot probably began in the second act, and grew more and more complicated until it was quickly unravelled in the third or fourth according to the length of the play. Whether the play was a good one or not depended chiefly upon the intensity with which the audience was made to wonder how on earth the characters were going to get out of their particular fix, how the compromising letter would be recovered, or the misunderstanding cleared up. Ingenuity of construction was, then, an absolutely essential quality in a dramatist. If he could draw character as well, or create situations of emotional interest, he was a good dramatist ; but neither of these powers by themselves served to win him that reputation or even to get his plays acted at all. The exposition in the first act was often immensely more interesting than either the plot or the dénouement, but the play was condemned if these were not neatly contrived. The result of this tradition was to prevent a number of writers, who had greater power of communicating emotion and a far greater understanding of human nature than many successful playwrights, from writing for the stage at all. Either they did not possess the degree of ingenuity necessary to construct a plot, or they were bored with having to treat the problems arising out of character and circumstance mechanically.

The tendency of modern dramatic art is now to make the characters and the emotional and moral significance of the situations the most important elements, and to reduce the plot to a minimum. The characters in consequence are not merely presented during the early scenes, but go on developing till the end of the play, so that the spectator may have to alter his first impressions. In consequence, the faculty upon which the modern play tends to rely more and more in the spectator is no longer the power of following the indications of a complex story, but of seizing and remembering shades of character and emotion ; and the spectator's pleasure depends now not so much on being unable to guess what is going to happen next, as in being able to recognize that what does happen next is true and interesting, either as a fact in human nature or as proving or disproving some theory or belief. Of course good construction is necessary in every play. The stage always makes the most rigid economy of incidents necessary, and if one event can be made to serve the purposes of illustrating several points, so much the better; but the revolt against "the well-constructed" play is, on one side, a denial of the statement that every play in order to be good must have the same kind of construction, and, on the other, the assertion that character and nature are more interesting on the stage (as elsewhere) than a cunningly dovetailed series of unlikely events, and that they are therefore in reality more "dramatic." This does not, of course, imply that all situations and developments of character are "dramatic" simply because they are interesting; nor does it get rid of the necessity for "action" in a play, for "action" is the quickest and most vivid way of exhibiting character. But it must be remembered that action may be internal as well as external. It is, then, a protest against the condemnation of a play which has succeeded in being interesting, on the ground that there is not enough "action" in it, or because it does not keep the audience in doubt about the manner in which it will end.

If the emotions and relations between the characters in any story or situation are of the kind which admit of being represented interestingly in the limited time the theatre allows, then, as long as a dramatist succeeds in this, it is absurd to find fault with him; but if they can only be interesting or beautiful when their gradual, minute, internal development is shown, then they are not the subject-matter for the dramatist, but for the novelist. The danger besetting the new school is in the choice of subjects simply on account of their interest from the point of view of either psychology or morals, without paying enough regard to this distinction ; the justification of their principles is that their works have increased enormously the importance and interest of the theatre.

The first characteristic of Mr. Hankin as a dramatist is that he is easy to act ; his characters are very clearly drawn, and the emotions and situations with which his plays deal are within the reach of a very moderate range of experience. The parts do not call for "temperament" or imagination in the actors so much as intelligence and sympathy, which are easier to find. His other qualities are lightness of touch, an original humour, the power of weighing character in a very even balance, and dexterity in introducing into a very ordinary series of events, which the audience is certain will be evolved along the most natural lines, an element of surprise and suspense. The Return of the Prodigal shows all these qualities at their best.

The party at the Jacksons' house has just broken up, when the butler rushes in to say that the Master Eustace, whom all believed to be in Australia, is lying lifeless on the doorstep. There is a moment of wild excitement and agitation, and a pale, mud-bespattered youth is carried in and laid upon the sofa. Will he revive? Certainly some instinctive tenderness for him revives in the bosom of his family. In the frantic search for restoratives he is left alone for a moment, when the audience is surprised to see him coolly raise himself and settle again more comfortably into a dead faint. Amid cries of "My darling boy!" "He's not dead!" "He's coming to!" the curtain falls. One is very curious to know what sort of a scapegrace he will turn out to be. He turns out a limp, cleverish fellow with a firm conviction of his own utter incompetence. He has knocked about the world, lost the money he was sent out with, and now, tired and mildly reckless, he has come home to enjoy again the comforts of clean clothes, rest, and a little indulgence, even if he has to pose as a wreck to get them. What is to become of him? What on earth are his family to do with him? That is the interest of the play, and it is sustained to the end. His mother and sister are glad enough to pet him; but after he has loafed about the house some days, and even the country doctor can no longer pretend that there is anything the matter with him, his brother and his father come down with the question, "What do you propose to do?" He answers: "Nothing. I can't do anything. What do you propose to do?" He has told his brother in confidence that his physical collapse on the night of his arrival was a bit of acting to rouse sympathy, thus making him an irritated accomplice in his success. Both father and brother are fretting to get rid of him. He regards them as a couple of heartless humbugs, who exploit others, and, being slaves to snobbish aims, can for once be exploited by himself. When a tailor's bill comes in, and his father in a fit of desperation threatens to turn him out of the house, the Prodigal simply replies: "Very well. I shall go to the nearest workhouse, and do you think you will get into Parliament if the constituency hears that you, a wealthy manufacturer, have driven your son to the workhouse?" To his brother he says: "Do you suppose you will succeed in uniting yourself to a good county family (especially as the girl doesn't care for you, and even likes me better) if there is such a horrid scandal in your own?" He has them in a cleft stick. In the last act they propose to send him off to Australia again with another £1,000. He refuses that, for he would simply lose it as he did the first thousand, and starve again. He holds out for £250 a year, and promises never to show his face in future without request. He takes a cheque for his first quarter's allowance, and departs that very night to avoid seeing his fond, foolish old mother again.

This may seem a slender theme for a play, and the solution of a problem, into which the spectator has entered with an almost parental perplexity, by the allowance of £250 may sound flat; but the dénouement is not flat, and the suspense is kept up till the last. The dialogue is most spirited and natural, and often extremely amusing. The Prodigal excites a good deal of sympathy, because he is moved by the sympathy of his mother and sister, and because he is miserable and aware of his own feebleness, which he makes the justification of his claim, as he really believes himself incapable of earning a living; while a scene between brother and sister, very touching in its matter-of-factness, makes one feel that father and son are fair game, by revealing that her prospects of a free and happy future have been ruined by being dragged by them into a society where for her there is little chance of marriage. Stella Faringford will probably marry Henry Jackson. Some kind of a love-liking springs up between her and the Prodigal in the course of the four acts, just enough to make the sense of his own incompetence harder to bear and the conclusion of the play doubtful.

The Charity that Began at Home is not so good. At the close of the play you are left in doubt as to which characters are meant to be in the right and which in the wrong; and this is here a defect, because they are divided into two groups holding opposite views of life. Lady Denison and Margery and Hylton make living for others their rule of life, and act on the assumption that every one is good at bottom, and that only kindness is required to make them behave well; while Hugh Verreker and Mrs. Eversleigh take the view of human nature upon which the ordinary judgments of the law and society rest.

Lady Denison is a delightful character, and she was delightfully played by Miss Florence Haydon. Her art is based upon a kindly, humorous, and minute observation, in quality something akin to Mr. Hankin's own comic perception, namely a subtle relish for inconsequence of speech, and for a kind of unconscious wit, which results from an intelligent muddle-headedness. This cosy, acquiescing, scatter-brained old lady obeys the promptings of a soft heart, with many sighs over the quandaries in which it lands her, only less bewildering and painful to her than would be the alternative of showing severity. Her remark while protesting against Hylton's argument that the butler, in spite of having seduced the maid, must be allowed to stop on, reveals her. "It may save a soul," says Hylton. "Oh, how very annoying!" she exclaims, and decides at once to keep him. On the other hand, when she learns that her daughter is engaged to Verreker, whose shady past has just been revealed, she is very much upset and shocked, notwithstanding her "belief" in everybody's underlying goodness. Mrs. Eversleigh, after saying "This comes of your idiotic principle of being kind to worthless people," asks her, with asperity, what step she proposes to take. "I shall dismiss Soames," she answers firmly, pressing the electric bell (Act. II. curtain). Truly a very inconsequent old lady! But she is very real and convincing.

The Silver Box was most admirably performed. It is Mr. Galsworthy's triumph to have contrived to be subtle without intricacy, and the triumph of the actors and management to have represented the scenes with so much nature and minute accuracy. Very seldom has a performance so careful had at the same time so much the air of a play that acted itself. Mr. Galsworthy's qualities as a dramatist are precision of design, a well-poised estimate of human nature, and the command of cool well-considered satire, which is the more effective for being unexcited, and the more remarkable for being combined with a strong interest in social questions.

The first act takes place in the dining-room of John Barthwick's heavy rich house. His son Jack (perfectly played by Mr. A. E. Matthews) returns drunk between twelve and one at night. He has got in with the help of a workman who happened to see him fumbling at the key-hole. Jack enters, in a state of sordid exhilaration, waving a reticule which he has snatched away "for a rag" from the woman in whose flat he has spent the evening. He offers Jones the workman, who has sulkily followed him in, a drink, as he has not got a tip in his pocket. Jones, who has been looking for work all day on an empty stomach, takes a stiff glass of whisky, with the result that it flies to his head. He is not at all a bad sort of man ; but he is down on his luck and gloomily resentful against a world which treats him badly. Mr. McKinnel conveyed his character perfectly. After apostrophizing the torpid Jack, he snatches up the woman's purse and the Barthwicks' silver cigarette-box and goes out. The impulse which makes him take them is exactly the same kind of drunken spite which made Jack carry off the reticule from its owner. Next morning, when the box is missed, suspicion falls on Mrs. Jones, who is the Barthwicks' charwoman, and in the next act her room is searched and she is arrested as well as her husband, who loudly protests that he alone is guilty. The Unknown Lady has meanwhile called to recover her purse ; Jack's escapade is revealed, and his father, who refunds the missing money, naturally wishes to hush up the whole matter. But the prosecution cannot now be withdrawn, and the last act is laid in a London police-court. The charge against the Joneses is the theft of the box. By the help of the Barthwicks' solicitor, who takes advantage of Jack's cowardice and muddled recollection of the night's doings, the magistrate is persuaded that Jones got into the house through Jack having left his key in the door ; this task is facilitated by Jones' truculent clamours for justice. Mrs. Jones is discharged ; Jones gets a month's hard labour ; and Jack leaves the court as a young scapegrace who has deserved indulgent reproof.

One of Mr. R. V. Harcourt's merits as a playwright is his dialogue, which reflects better, I think, than that of any other dramatist's, the offhand sparkle and exhilaration of the lives of the children of leisure and pleasure. Mr. Sutro makes such people wickedly epigrammatic and very vulgar ; Mr. Arthur Jones can hardly be said to be successful in such characters ; Mr. Pinero reproduces this atmosphere well, but still he does not get it quite right. It is a society in which the fools are apt to show quick intelligence and "the gifted what seems to the thoughtful an extraordinary limitation of view." The peculiar quality does not lie only in a frank avowal of having an eye to the main chance and of the permanency of natural instincts. Mr. Pinero seems to me to miss in his plays a kind flexibility of feeling in these people, which, I think, Mr. Harcourt is very happy in rendering. This gift of writing society dialogue will stand him in good stead, and there is little doubt that to it he chiefly owes the acceptance of the plays he has already written.

But the chief merit in Mr. Harcourt's plays, the merit which induces me to back him for success, is the cause also of his present failure. His best quality is his acute and intricate sense of a situation. His sense of it is so complete that he cannot bear to prune it down to bare issues ; and so, not having any particular deftness in stage craft, he naturally involves himself and his audience in perplexity.

His play A Question of Age missed fire for this reason. The story is one of cross-purposes. A widow on the verge of middle age tries to persuade a young man to become her lover, who is trying to screw up his mind to marry her for her money, and the complication arises out of each misunderstanding what the other wants.

Partly owing to an unfortunate omission in the dialogue at the first performance, the situation was still further embroiled.

Miss Fanny Brough and Mr. Kerr were both excellent in their parts.

The most remarkable feature of The Voysey Inheritance is the skill with which the interest in a single situation is maintained through four acts ; that this is a sign of fertility and not poverty of imagination all who have ever tried to write know well. Its second great merit is the vividness with which a large family is presented, each member of which is a distinct character. The second act is like a good chapter from a novel read at a happy moment of hallucination.

The men are sitting round the decanters and dessert. Major Booth Voysey (admirably played by Mr. Charles Fulton) is straddling in front of the fire and laying down the law in a loud, hectoring voice ; his father bends over his plate, cracking nuts and occasionally directing an acid remark at him. Old Mr. Booth and the vicar are at the table, unconscious victims of their host's financial talents ; an engaged daughter skips in and, glorying archly in the emancipation of her position, carries off her rather shame-faced betrothed to the solitude of the billiard-room ; Honor, " Mother's right hand," a nervous, slavishly unselfish, quite helpless old maid, bustles in and out in a distressed way on her brother's errands.

Mr. Voysey, the father of the family, has speculated all his life with the sums entrusted to his care as a solicitor ; at first to make up for the defalcations of his father, but afterwards, so it turns out, because he could not resist the temptation to use his financial talent. At the opening of the play he is in arrears again, owing to some unfortunate speculations ; and on admitting his son Edward into the partnership he reveals the trick to him. It is, he says, "the Voysey Inheritance," and he adds that strangely enough it has been the cause of his happiness, for after years of keeping his courage to the sticking place he enjoys a perpetual exhilaration from feeling under his feet the thinness of the crust on which his prosperous home is built. He is an admirable study. Edward is at first deeply shocked and troubled ; but when his father dies suddenly he takes up the Voysey inheritance and continues to speculate with the clients' money in order to refund those who would feel the loss most. By taking this decision he wins the regard of a girl he had long wanted to marry, and in her mouth is put the moral of the piece. She exhorts him to be a man and to go through with it, for he is only risking the money of the rich to pay back the poor. He does not, however, inspire the same confidence as his father, and when old Mr. Booth comes to the office to demand back his securities, Edward tells him everything. He is too sick of the whole business to care much what happens. Booth threatens to prosecute if he is not paid back at the rate of £1,000 a year, a condition which would prevent Edward refunding the money of men who have far less than old Booth. He refuses—and the matter is dropped. The fact that the play stops at this point is a defect, and it is a defect very characteristic of this school of dramatists. The interest of the author has been centred entirely on the moral development of the hero, and the growth in him of a new way of looking at life, with the consequence that when this has been accomplished subsequent developments do not appear to the dramatist important. Still, the audience would like to know whether old Booth did prosecute or not ; and the fact that the curtain falls at a juncture which rouses curiosity instead of satisfying it is a defect.

Prunella is a real Pierrot play. In what region of Europe an inventive mind brought forth the creature Pierrot, or among what popular imaginations he was first kindly fostered and formed, I do not know ; whether, like Punchinello and Columbina, he crossed the Alps of Italy, or whether he bears by birthright his French name. But this may be taken as certain, that he was born in the Latin zone, beyond the influence of Northern tenderness and Northern seriousness. For, though the peculiar blend of human sentiment which he engenders and embodies contains both seriousness and tenderness, they are of a kind so inimical to ours, that we instinctively condemn them as hardness and frivolity. If there are virtues which Pierrot hates, they are dignity, self-respect, and consistency. He has never been able to take life more seriously, as far as behaviour is concerned, than his own amusing mummeries, and men have found him pleasant company because he is so shockingly free from any sense of responsibility. He flatters their self-importance by his contrasted flimsiness, and the gravid mind enjoys vicariously in him a light-heeled dance. Yet he is not gay. He would lose many of his boon companions if he were ; since true gaiety does not flatter in itself ; rather it dismays those who cannot accompany its towerings. It cannot be patronized ; Pierrot can be. He often whimpers for a little pity, hiding his need in comic antics, in case he should not be understood. True, if you give it him, when he thinks he has not betrayed the craving, you may be startled by a flare of pride ; but it is a flash in a shallow pan, and if you pity him again he will melt. If you could get him to philosophize quietly upon himself, without crowing like a cock or pouring the wine on your head, you would probably find that the one virtue upon which he prided himself was humility. He would say that nobody in the world seemed humble except himself; if you said, "That sounds rather like a contradiction in terms," he would not be the least disconcerted. He might go on to confide that the want of humility in everybody else seemed to him, when he was in good spirits, the most grotesquely funny thing in the world, but that oftener it simply crushed him. No one, he would add, who cultivated a sense of responsibility could have humility; such a sense was in itself a proof of arrogance. He feels his humility will take him to heaven.

All this may seem to have very little to do with the play; but it does concern the sentiment of the play. For this is a real Pierrot play; not a fake. It may be careless here and there; but it is not a fake. Therefore, the sentiment of Pierrot must be understood, if the play is to be appreciated, and, above all, this "humility," which is so unsympathetic to the majority of us, who, whatever opinions we may have about art or the body or pleasure, have an ascetic repugnance to any intimate form of self-abandonment, feeling that humility is less than reverence, and that reverence implies a restraint of emotion, whether in religion, love, or sympathy. So much for Pierrot. I can only give an idea of the play by trying to describe one or two scenes; to tell the story baldly would destroy the sentiment.

In a correct and charming garden, situated it does not matter where, one summer's morning, it does not matter when, for this is the kingdom of fancy, are sitting three prim maiden ladies, outside their staid old red-brick house. Near to a high yew hedge stands a dry fountain over which a figure representing Love presides, his chin upon a fiddle. A little girl, say sixteen years old, sits some few paces off them, reading out her lesson in a monotonous sing-song. Prunella reads and reads, and the ladies, her severe, particular aunts, begin to yawn and then to nod and then to sleep. And as she reads she is aware of a merry, bewildering music; faint at first, then nearer and nearer; she holds her breath; she gabbles faster and faster; louder and louder it sounds; it draws her like an eddy; the maiden aunts wake with a horrified jump and bustle into the house; over the high, thick hedge come paper startlers and handfuls of confetti; the din grows chaotic and rowdy—whistles and catcalls and songs—as the mystic mummers go by on the road of the outside world. Prunella, panting with excitement, stands tiptoe on a chair to peep over. Then, at her feet she sees Pierrot crouching; head adroop in whimsical adoration, geranium lips pouted to an O, black eyebrows arched in a blank white stare. "What are you doing here, you beautiful white boy?" Presently, the whole band are round her, dancing and laughing and tempting and teasing—Scaramel, Kennel and Callow, Tawdry and Doll and Romp; and Prunella at last gives Pierrot a kiss, to ease him of his elaborate pain.

Another scene: it is moonlight, and the house is shut. Pierrot, seated in pensive expectation on the rim of the fountain, is serenading her window, vicariously, through the voice of Tenor, dressed like him. The mandolin tinkles and quavers; the stars seem to throb. The song stops; and Pierrot advances underneath her window. All is silent ; Scaramel fetches a ladder : " Little bird in your nest, are you there ? " Slowly the window opens, and Prunella, her hair flying a tattery dark cloud upon her shoulders, kneels in the window. Quietly the garden begins to fill with fantastic figures ; they dance and beckon, mopping and mowing, whispering and laughing. Pierrot calls to her to come down. Then follows a love duet, the dissonant harmony of which I shall not try to suggest. They strew flowers before her and crown her bewildered head, and call her Pierrette. Before she yields, she kneels before the statue of Love, imploring his oracle. The figure begins to live, the bow to slowly move across the strings, and the marble instrument to sound, " drawing out her soul like a spider's thread." The statue bids her go with her lover.

Some years have past. It is autumn ; the dry leaves scuttle drearily down the weedy garden paths. Two of the sisters are dead, and Privacy, the last of them, has lived on alone, hoping Prunella would come back. She is poor, and the house has been bought by a mysterious rich gentleman. This day he is to take possession. He enters, dressed in black ; it is Lord Pierrot. He first deserted, and then he lost Pierrette. He has come to live in " The Dutch Garden," that he may, if possible, lay the ghost of his love. To-night he has called his old companions round him to dispel his miserable regrets. They are withered and spiritless now, and it is but a death's-head feast they can hold together. Pierrette, a wandering beggar-girl, comes back, too, while they are eating and drinking inside the house ; and after reproaching Love for his deception, she falls asleep in the fountain basin.

Pierrot, in an agony of self-reproach, acts over again the window-scene of his wooing of Prunella and once more kneels at the fountain. . . . For the last time the statue speaks, and all is happy.

The actors seemed to enjoy their parts. They certainly played most admirably. Miss Dorothy Minto was enrapturing as Prunella, and Mr. Graham Browne's Pierrot was a work of art. The music followed and expressed every turn of the sentiment.

Before going on to the plays by foreign dramatists a word must be said about Mr. Masfield's short play, The Campden Wonder. It is a story taken from the history of Campden, where in 1666 two men and their old mother were hung on the confession, steadily adhered to, of one of the sons, that they had murdered a man who afterwards turned out to be alive. The motive of this murderous bit of perjury has never been discovered. Mr. Masfield has invented a motive. The elder, a drunken sot, is determined to degrade his mild, steady brother. In the first scene the brothers quarrel; this scene is admirable: in the second he confesses before a muddle-headed old parson: in the third all three are in gaol, and one by one they are taken out and hanged. The wife of the supposed victim arrives too late with the news that she has seen her husband. The old woman whimpers distressingly, the young brother howls and pleads for his life, and cries out for his wife and children, the elder (admirably played by Mr. Norman McKinnel) hugs himself with a kind of insane, sardonic rapture at his triumph. He has stuck to his lie with a dogged, hulking stupidity—"For un's gowld un did it." His psychology, the presentation of a mind in which malignity is mixed with the stupidity of madness, is the author's best success. The dialogue of some of the scenes is written with a force and directness which has a marked æsthetic quality; but the performance was not satisfactory.

This piece, again, is most characteristic, in its merits and its weakness, of the new school. Where is the plot? What is the point? were the questions asked. The answer is that it does not pretend to have either plot or moral; it is simply a tragic story and a piece of life—"and life, some think, is worthy of the Muse."

[For the following account of a play which I missed I am indebted to a friend.]

Votes for Women! by Miss Elizabeth Robins, was called "a dramatic tract." The story of the play, which was almost entirely confined to the first and third acts, was dramatic indeed—even melodramatic; but, as far as the propaganda of the Woman Suffrage party are concerned, it probably disappointed the most ardent supporters of the movement, who would anticipate, from the use of the word "tract," that the play would champion the demand for the extension of the franchise. It did indeed do so, but indirectly, by including that demand for "votes" in the more important demand for "rights." Put shortly, the problem lay in the relations of the three principal characters—relations by no means new to the stage. Geoffrey Stonor, a man of rank and position in social and parliamentary circles, affianced to Beatrice Dunbarton, a young lady of his own standing, meets by accident Vida Levering, with whom he had lived in earlier days. The last act of the play is devoted to the re-adjustment of the relative positions of these three characters, in the light of a complete understanding on the part of each.

Written throughout with the customary cleverness of the author, the play was chiefly remarkable for a brilliant piece of realism in the second act. Author, stage-manager, and actors combined to give a vivid representation of a suffragist meeting in Trafalgar Square, which was applauded alike by those who went to see a play and those who went to hear their cause promoted. The working woman, the youthful enthusiast, and the male champion (one of Mr. Edmund Gwenn's greatest triumphs) were all represented, and Vida Levering (admirably played by Miss Wynne-Matthison) spoke from her own sad experience. Most successful of all, however, was the crowd on the stage, comprising every type of a Trafalgar Square audience, and overflowing with the usual impromptu comments—earnest, sarcastic, approving, flippant, intoxicated. In short, this stage-audience represented the Chorus in a Greek play more nearly than anything in English drama since The Knight of the Burning Pestle, in as much as they gave vent to the gnomic and critical remarks of the ordinary spectator.

FOREIGN PLAYS

Aglavaine and Selysette was not impressive, though sometimes it was really moving. It is the story of a child-wife whose husband meets a woman he can love more seriously. Aglavaine and he both have a tender love for "little Selysette;" but they know their feelings for each other are the best they have ever felt, and they hope that Selysette will go on being happy in the kind of love her husband has always given her, nor be pained by the sight of an intimacy her nature cannot understand. But Selysette does understand one thing—that she is in the way; and so she jumps down from a tower and is killed. Now it is absolutely necessary, in order to feel what the author intends, that we should believe the man and the woman to be very wonderful people; and the fault of the play is that we have to take this for granted instead of being made to believe it. Both of them do nothing but talk of their love, and kiss and pity "little Selysette." Mr. Donald Tovey's music was beautiful.

Herr Schnitzler's play In the Hospital is a pure bit of psychology. Karl Rademacher, an author, is dying in the General Hospital. His last request is that a friend of his youth, now a successful literary quack, should visit him. He wants to revenge his failure by proving that he was the lover of this man's wife, and that she knew him for the better man. He works himself into such a frenzy of vindictive delight at the thought of the blow he is going to strike at this sleek humbug, that he almost dies. Mr. Beveridge acted with both intensity and restraint. The literary man comes to his side after the paroxysm, and Rademacher dies without telling him a word, for when he sees him it does not seem worth while, and then he has already slaked in imagination his thirst for revenge.

The performance of The Wild Duck at the Court Theatre was rather disappointing. Though each part was admirably played, as a whole it was not so impressive as the performance of Herr Andresen's company at the German Theatre last winter. This was due firstly to the actors taking some scenes too fast, and secondly to the peculiarity of Mr. Granville Barker's rendering of Hialmar, though in itself it was an accomplished and consistent piece of acting.

His Hialmar Ekdal was a pitiable and ridiculous figure, instead of a repulsive and ridiculous one; for though many may deny the harsh impeachment, Hialmar is a wide shot that hits half the world. But that he should be represented as disgusting, repulsive, revolting, as well as ridiculous, is absolutely essential if the unity of the play is to be maintained. If any scene in The Wild Duck is played as simple comedy, if your laughter is not always on the wrong side of your mouth, the meaning of the play is obscured, and the suicide of Hedvig at the end will seem the wilful work of a morbid pessimist who sets down things in malice.

Ibsen's work seems that of a man who started life self-distrusting, modest, and ready to admire, and found out at last that men whom he thought better were in reality worse than himself. There is a kind of hard pity in this play which speaks most distinctly in the mouth of Relling, who has kept alive that modicum of self-respect necessary to life in the poor wrecks of humanity he meets, by fostering in them what he calls their "life illusions." Ibsen allows no good nature in art, and the fault we have to find with Mr. Barker's interpretation is that it is too good-natured. He played Hialmar as though he were a creation of the relenting and vivacious satire of Mr. Shaw, who is always careful to let every character state his case, to lend him the brains of a devil's advocate for the occasion, and not only to show the very pulse of the machine but to lecture to the audience upon its working. Though it would be absurd to say that Mr. Barker intentionally took the audience into his confidence, he often emphasized too consciously the ironic intentions of the dramatist. If Hedvig at the end had emerged from the sliding doors of the garret and made an irrefutable little speech, asserting her intention to get a comfortable settlement out of Werle, and explaining that her father did not really care two straws whose child she was, it would not have been very incongruous with the spirit in which some of the scenes were played. No, that is saying too much; but if this statement is taken with a large pinch of salt, readers of the play will get an idea of what was disappointing in the performance of many fine bits of acting.

Mr. George, as old Ekdal, was good, especially in the first act, when Hialmar, Gregers (the idealist), and he are drinking their beer together. His tipsy winks and dark hints that his hunting days are not over, his determination that very night to show the garret, with its strange contents, withered Christmas trees, sleeping fowls and rabbits, and the cherished wild duck snug in her basket, all these were admirable. The group round the garret door, the mysterious moonlit peep within, the old man with upraised lamp, his proud chuckling replies to the guests' astonished questions, Hialmar's simulated indifference, and the child's eager explanations made up a scene not easy to forget; while in the foreground sat the anxious, silent woman, who keeps these creatures fed and housed, hugging her shawl about her with a shiver, feeling, not understanding, the shame and shirking which such substitutes for real life mean.

Miss Agnes Thomas was the best English Gina I remember. The only criticism which can be made upon her interpretation, which was complete in itself, is that it is not the most interesting one possible. She emphasized the impatience which can be read into Gina's replies; but these are most impressive when they are spoken passively in self-defence. The Gina most worth acting is the Gina who, padding about in her felt slippers, never doubts for a moment that she should do everything for those she loves, and, unless she is defending her husband from criticism, which she is quick to scent far off, dimly feels what Relling the philosopher understands; and to act her thus the superficial comedy of her clumsy simplicity must never quite distract attention from the delicacy of her nature, which finds expression in that moving exclamation when Hedvig lies dead, while Hjalmar rants over her, and Relling looks down at her with professional detachment, "The child mustn't lie here for a show."

One moment Miss Thomas succeeded in stamping on the imagination with a force no actress could have bettered; the moment when she rounds on Hjalmar's petulant, bullying questions about Hedvig's parentage with "I don't know—how can I tell—a creature like me?" In her voice and gesture you felt indignation, revolt, and shame. This was Hjalmar's best scene, too, unless he was as admirable when he repulsed Hedvig, with hysterical gesticulations of abhorrence, and dashed like a maniac from the house. Miss Dorothy Minto's Hedvig was particularly good. But she missed expressing to the full the blank dismay of horror Hedvig must have felt, when her sulky father, looking into the sitting-room the morning after his debauch, tells her to get out, and holds the door open, glowering soddently at her, without a word. It is the last time she sees her father, and she cannot understand. That walk across the stage to the kitchen is an important incident, if we are to be convinced that Hedvig would have shot herself.

Mr. Lang's Relling could have only been improved in one respect, which was not in his power to remedy. In casting the part of Relling, I believe the important quality to look for in the personality of the actor is his voice. As this may seem a fanciful flight of criticism, it is necessary to explain ; for it rests on a conception of the character which may not be shared. Relling has been described by Brandes as a humorous personification of Ibsen himself, and certainly the moral of the piece speaks through his mouth ; but this definition of him is far from the truth. He, too, has gone to seed, though he remains a sort of doctor still, and still can help the spiritually sick by hiding their natures from their own eyes ; that is his universal remedy. But the secret of his peculiar blend of bitter tenderness and cynical leniency lies in his own character. If you met him you would see in his eyes that he had defrauded his own soul. Now, you cannot get an impression from a person on the stage in that subtle way ; but you can hear it in a voice. The actor, then, to play Relling is a man whose voice contrasts oddly, disagreeably, though sometimes the sound of it brings a sense of relief, with the grating things he says. This is a personal impression, of course, and must be taken for what it is worth. You should hear something like despair in his voice, however trenchant and contemptuous his manner of speaking when he pronounces his famous dictum, "Life would be quite tolerable if only we could get rid of the confounded duns that keep on pestering us in our poverty with the claims of the ideal."

Many think The Wild Duck the best of Ibsen's prose dramas. There is certainly none which shows a completer mastery of stage craft. It must have astonished his admirers when it first appeared ; for it looks like a satire on his own philosophy. It is an assault on "Ibsenites," on men and women who think that to blurt out the truth and destroy everything which has an alloy of compromise and sham in it, is the sure remedy for social and private evils. Nothing Ibsen has written makes us respect him more. He had always declared that, "What is wanted is a revolution in the spirit of man ;" in this play he faces the reformer's worst trial, the conviction of the fundamental weakness of human nature.

The performance of Hedda Gabler was better than that of The Wild Duck. It is seldom so remarkable a play is so remarkably acted. Mrs. Patrick Campbell's acting of Hedda was not one hair's-breadth out. Hedda, as a character, strikes us as at once monstrous and familiar. She is a woman who considers herself déplacée, not merely by having married out of a fast, fashionable set, and taken a humdrum bookish man, with irritating little habits, for a husband ; but one who considers herself déplacée in the world itself. She is bored to death, like Madame Bovary—the marvel is that the psychology of Flaubert's novel is compressed into this astonishing play—but, unlike Emma Bovary, having experienced the delights of the children of leisure and pleasure she cherishes no illusions about them. "She has danced till she was tired." The whole of life appears to her mean and wretched, child-bearing a particularly odious humiliation, love a fraud, and even an illicit intrigue too "banal" to have any attraction. She prides herself on her boredom, lassitude and disgust, taking them for signs of an aristocratic spirit, which the experiences of vulgar souls can never satisfy. Living in a permanent condition of sulky conceit, her only pleasure lies in swaggering; and since her circumstances are too narrow for display, she falls back on inflicting petty humiliations on those in her power, like her aunt Nora. It follows from this sullen arrogance that the one thing she cannot bear the thought of is—humiliation; hence her dread of scandal, of being mixed up in anything shameful and sordid, like Lövborg's death; hence the power of Judge Brack's threat to involve her in it; hence her preference for suicide to remaining at his mercy; hence, too, the explanation of her never having yielded to an attraction for Lövborg or for any other man. Her ruling passion prevents her ever giving herself away. She could only marry a man she despised. This stupid, sullen conceit is like a wall dividing her from life; she cannot throw herself into anything without dispelling her cherished illusion of superiority; she is only safe in acting upon others from a superior height. She is envious and loves power; she therefore drags Lövborg down out of a kind of cold malignity, warmed by a little jealousy of Mrs. Elvsted, much as Iago's dispassionate hatred is just touched by a little lust for Desdemona. Like Iago, she is a kind of inarticulate playwright, too stupid to imagine, who gratifies at once a longing for power and a love of excitement by using human beings as puppets. This is the source of Hedda's impulse to make Lövborg drink, that she may see him "with vine-leaves in his hair," and to shoot himself, that she may know that "beautiful actions" are possible.

Mrs. Patrick Campbell became this character to the life. It speaks wonders for the Court Theatre management that she did not act the others off the stage.

Mr. Trevor Lowe, as George Tesman, Hedda's husband, was excellent, and Mr. James Hearn's Judge Brack was a good piece of careful acting. Lövborg's entrance the morning after the debauch, in which he has lost his manuscript and his self-respect, was most impressive. Mr. Laurence Irving can, as the phrase is, "look volumes." It is a rare power; and this faculty, of standing silently and suggesting in attitude and face an intense state of emotion, is perhaps the most remarkable of his talents.

Two defects came out in the play; one of them is an unlikely bit of human nature, the other is a defect which the inevitable compression of the dramatic form forces on Ibsen. The latter is interesting from the point of view of discussions upon the drama in general, because it illustrates one of the chief difficulties of the psychological playwright. The first is this. When Hedda tells Tesman that she has destroyed Lövborg's manuscript, and explains (lying, of course) that she did it because she could not bear any one to write better than her husband, she succeeds in preventing him from questioning her, and, indeed, from thinking any more about it, by hinting that she is going to have a child. Tesman at once approaches her with uxorious tenderness, and forgets all about the destruction of a manuscript. Now news of the description Hedda conveys would not drive out of any husband's head the fact that his wife had just burnt a work of genius; but far less out of Tesman's, who was a book-minded man. He prides himself on having proper family feelings; but his heart is in his dog-like reverence for men of intellectual power. It is more probable that he would have exclaimed: "Oh, Hedda, dear, fancy that!" and gone on pressing her with questions and exclaiming about the destruction of Lövborg's book.

The second incident that seems unnatural, is Mrs. Elvsted sitting down with Tesman to reconstruct the book immediately after hearing of Lövborg's death. It is very likely that she should find consolation in this work and marry Tesman over it; but since she was devoted enough to run away from her children and brave a scandal in order to keep an eye on Lövborg while he was under temptation, it is not likely that she would recover in a few minutes from the news of his death. But Ibsen wishes to show the future, and a single incident is all he has time for. Thus, in order to indicate a development psychologically sound, he is driven to represent one of his characters acting in a way which is psychologically false. This is the dilemma that lies in wait for the psychological dramatist at every turn.

THE THIEVES' COMEDY

How the southern Germans, the mild, reflective schwärmerisch Germans, who love to drink their yellow wine and brown beer in sunny arbours, who made the songs, and spun the long philosophies, and invented the dusty romance of gigantic erudition, who sit now with melancholy inertia, while unphilosophic, humourless, musicless, pedantic Prussia, with clicking-heels and twitched-up moustachios, stamps romance and individuality out of their country,—how they must have enjoyed the stinging satire of this play! True, the realism of Frau Wolff's home in the forest, with her hulking husband, and the two frisky young girls, who evidently would rather kiss than spin, may not have been much to their taste; but the egregious Von Wehrhahn, the Emperor-worshipping magistrate, who is so bent on scenting out socialism and sedition that he insults the witnesses and lets thief and receiver escape from under his nose—he must have been a savoury dish!

The satire is delightful to us, who are detached, and the whole play impressively amusing. Miss Filippi acted the part of Frau Wolff, the thieving, indefatigable, imperturbably plausible housewife, extraordinarily well. Who can help liking so cheerful, capable, and sensible a woman? One's sympathies in the matter of the stolen fire-wood and fur coat are violently on her side. Glasenapp (Mr. Norman Page), the old clerk, perched on a high stool in front of an unwieldy ledger, with his plaintive voice and wheedling laughter, faint like the crackle of old parchments, might have come out of or have gone into a novel of Dickens just as he was. The Thieves' Comedy is one of those plays that stay in the mind as a series of pictures. Here is one which has kept its colours in mine for two years.

It is quite late, and dark outside the Wolffs' cottage. Wulkoff, the barge-man (poacher and receiver as well), has just come in to bargain for a stolen deer. Frau Wolff bustles about her housework as though she did not care two scraps about the matter, repeating her offer in loud cheerful decided voice, as he climbs sulkily up the ladder of prices. Suddenly a call, melancholy and prolonged like the howl of a dog, is heard outside the window.

"Frau Wolff, Frau Wo-ol-ff." Whist! they stop talking; out goes the light; sack and deer are crammed away; "Frau Wo-o-olf:" she goes to the door with an air of astonished cheery welcome, and, after an interval during which a theft of firewood is planned—Mitteldorf, the policeman, comes in! Now no pen can suggest to any one who has not seen Mr. Harry Dodd as Mitteldorf what a smashing anticlimax this is! The hair at the back of your head has been gently raised by that awful tapering cry outside the black window, and by the guilty whispering hurry of the inmates; and then—Mitteldorf appears! Mitteldorf is the stupidest man ever seen on the stage. On this occasion, the night of his understanding is further obscured by a slight haze of beer, and he stidders himself on his heels, for a moment, before stepping in. Frau Wolff is in the habit of selling him a good many of the eggs and other petty filchings, which he spends his days in trying to trace; to-night, he has come in for a chat. I don't think he actually sits down on the deer, and after helping to harness the sleigh, which is destined to carry off the firewood, he goes away.

Not having seen Mr. Harry Dodd in any other parts, I cannot judge the scope of his powers, but his Mitteldorf was the performance of a perfect comedian.

CHAPTER III

MR. BERNARD SHAW is a difficult subject for criticism : there is so much to discuss, and yet so much has been already said ; there are so many interesting things to say about his work which are not quite true, and so many true things which are not interesting ; and to crown all, he has explained himself many times. But since his plays are far the most important dramatic contributions the Court Theatre has received, and since its celebrity and success is rooted in them, the critical commentator must give him the largest share of attention. I propose, therefore, in this chapter, to discuss first the characters in these plays ; secondly, the treatment of the emotions in them ; and thirdly (in the last chapter) to give a separate account of each play and its performance.

HIS CHARACTERS

There is one characteristic of Mr. Shaw's imaginative work which, oddly enough, has not been commented upon ; perhaps it has been considered too obvious for comment. It is the exceptional variety and vividness of his characters. They have, too, a peculiar quality, which makes them stay in the memory, and enables them to pass, like the types of Dickens, into conversation. For instance, 'Enery Straker, Prossy, Broadbent, "B. B.," Ann (to rob her of that philosophic universality which her creator claims for her), all possess this quality. Once seen on the stage, they become types in the spectator's imagination, approximations to which he is constantly meeting in real life. Any one, for instance, would be understood directly who said, "I travelled up in the train to-day with a little mechanic—a sort of 'Enery Straker." Such characters are drawn by constantly bringing into relief one distinguishing feature, too complex perhaps to be defined, in such a way that the imagination instinctively supplies all the other qualities. It is the triumph of the playwright to achieve this intense simplification, and if the Shavian theatre is compared with the work of other modern playwrights in this respect, its superiority is overwhelmingly apparent.

In psychological observation, Mr. Shaw has a caricaturist's quickness in seizing the salient feature; but this is combined in him with a constant sense that the stuff of human nature is much the same in every one. The kind of distinctness which his characters possess differs, consequently, from the distinctness which the old school of psychological dramatists achieved. They were always seeking for "the ruling passion" in their men and women, and making them act accordingly, thus in effect dividing mankind into species—the proud man, the miser, the libertine, etc. Mr. Shaw emphasizes, on the other hand, that men are at bottom swayed by the same common impulses, and that their behaviour is generally what circumstances, education, and the treatment they receive from others at the moment make it; he never fails, therefore, to suggest that society is responsible for their misdeeds as well as for their oddities. As a social reformer, he has theorized upon and analyzed the effect of this or that social environment on life and character ; as an artist he has always been preoccupied with human nature. These two preoccupations, working together, have enabled him to seize with extraordinary quickness the traces which a particular manner of living leave on a personality. His figures are often exaggerated ; but in nine instances out of ten they are saved from being pointlessly fantastic by the fact that they are closely linked with social conditions. As a propagandist, again, he has perpetually been in violent collision with many people holding different points of view ; and as an observer he has noted the particular mental, physical, and social characteristics which usually go with particular ways of looking at the world. Such experience is of the utmost value to the dramatist ; (for drama depends upon the clash between characters who embody different points of view.) If on both sides the difference is one of conflicting desires, that is one kind of drama ; but it becomes far more interesting when the opposing wills represent whole groups of ideas by which many men hold and live. Such is the interest of the contest between the poet and the parson, over which Candida stands as umpire ; of the discussions between Larry and Broadbent, and of the blind mêlée at the end of the play between them and Father Keegan ; of the explosive interview between Roebuck and Tanner : of the sharp passage-of-arms between Undershaft and "the honest poor man" Peter Shirley, and of many other spirited encounters. In all these scenes, what impresses us is the hammer-and-tongs vigour with which each combatant stands up for his side, and the natural congruity—not inconsistency, often it is far otherwise—of his outlook with the sort of person his general behaviour shows him to be.

Mr. Shaw is the most striking refutation of the notion that an artist gets the best work out of himself when he holds aloof from the social and religious questions of his day; the artist in him owes an enormous debt to the reformer.

Those characters which strike us as exceptional rather than typical have the same distinctions. Among them Tanner, Valentine, Charteris, and Undershaft are particularly interesting to the analyst, because they combine in varying degrees the temperament and opinions which tell most in Mr. Shaw's writings when he speaks for himself. Tanner and Undershaft have definite systematic views upon morals and politics and human nature and though Valentine and Charteris have not, they are all four "realists," that is to say, they are not under what Mr. Shaw considers "romantic illusions." Valentine and Charteris would be easy converts to the complete doctrine. Valentine shares the fate of Tanner in being swallowed up in matrimony; but though he betrays a flutter of trepidation before the persistence of the young woman, whose feelings he has just taken by storm, he evidently has never had the true inward horror of his frightful predicament clearly revealed to him. Poor Charteris has even some misgivings about his escape from a similar quandary. It is true there is a touch of irony in his lament upon losing Grace Tranfield, which betrays a glimmering of philosophy; but there is also more than a trace of regret: Grace Tranfield was not such a one as Ann Whitefield.

"Yes; this is the doom of the philanderer. I shall have to go on philandering now all my life. No domesticity, no fireside, no little ones—nothing at all in Cuthbertson's line." The irony here has two edges.

But there is a second quality common to all these leading characters, unmistakable but harder to describe. It is a temperamental quality, which, by the way, makes these parts extremely hard to act: they are always on the verge of a state of lyrical excitement. Sometimes it takes the form of a sudden towering of high spirits, sometimes of a good-natured combative ecstasy, sometimes of explosive indignation. It differs in each character, but in all it is the same kind of emotion—a sudden sense of freedom and certainty, bringing with it sudden fluency and emphasis of speech, and a feeling of immunity and detachment, which is at the same time a state of extreme emotional mobility. Undershaft takes such moments very solemnly, he is certain he is “saved”; to Valentine they are whiffs of blind exhilarating joy; to the poet in Candida (who has the temperamental quality but does not share the opinions) they are inspirations; to Cusins (who also does not hold them) they are the moments when as a philosophic juggler he can keep all his bowls and basins spinning their fastest, when he can remember the point of twenty creeds at once, and of his love for Barbara into the bargain. To Tanner they are opportunities for psychological declamation.

All authors of merit give to their creations an excess of some characteristic which is dominant in themselves. Thus Mr. Meredith's characters are filled to an unnatural degree with the beauty and courage of life; Balzac gives to his a treble dose of will and appetite; the men and women in Mr. James's novels, the stupid as well as the intelligent, show a far subtler power of perception than such men and women would actually have. In the same way, Mr. Shaw gives to many of his principal characters temperaments which are marked by both extreme mobility and extreme detachment.

Sometimes this gift of himself on the part of a writer is more obviously diffused over the whole of his work than concentrated in characters. The Tempest, and, to add a modern example, some of the novels of Mr. Thomas Hardy, are instances. This is what we mean by creating "an atmosphere," when we use that word in a sense of high æsthetic praise, and not simply in order to indicate that the author has succeeded in giving us the sensation of particular scenes or surroundings. In this Mr. Shaw's work (though he is extremely skilful in creating "atmosphere" in the other sense) is deficient, and consequently it is not sufficiently admired by people whose perceptions are quick to see its other merits, but who delight above all things in this quality. His plays, with the exception, perhaps, of You Never Can Tell, are the outcome of his imagination working along the lines which his opinions have already laid down, rather than free expressions of his artistic temperament; with the result that those plays are the best to the making of which has gone the most hard, consistent thinking; and those in which the underlying thought is indistinct are, as wholes, very inferior to passages and characters in them—and, indeed, sometimes inferior to the work of inferior writers.

With regard to the characters which are neither "types" nor combinations, in varying proportions, of his own views and temperament, there are two obvious points to notice. Firstly, that all the women are astonishingly real—and how few dramatists can draw more than one kind of woman well! Candida, Nora Reilly, Lady Cecily Waynflete, Mrs. Clandon, Lady Britomart, are as different as possible; yet we know how they would behave under any circumstances. Secondly, the completeness with which such characters as Larry Doyle (a very subtle study), William the waiter, the Rev. James Morell are presented, and the distinctness of such minor figures as Crampton, Mrs. Whitefield, Father Dempsey, Roebuck Ramsden, Barney Doran, Mr. Malone the elder, and Octavius Robinson.

If the reader will review in imagination all the personages mentioned in this section, he will find it hard to parallel in any other dramatist a list of characters so various, so new to the stage, so easy to recognize and to remember.

HIS TREATMENT OF EMOTION

Next to the force with which original characters are presented, the most noticeable feature in Mr. Shaw's work is his treatment of emotion, and especially of sexual emotion. What first strikes us in the Shavian theatre is, perhaps, the frequency of excited scenes, of explosive arguments, violent protestations, gesticulations and agitations. Apart from the frequency of abstract discussions and the vigour of the dialogue there would be nothing very strange in this excitement, were not the passions and emotions, so violently displayed, represented as being also startlingly brief. This emphasis upon brevity of emotions is very characteristic, and one cause of the charge of cynicism which is so often brought against him. The typical scene is one in which the characters are represented in violent states of moral indignation, rage, perplexity, mortification, infatuation, despair, which subside as suddenly as they rise. / The Shavian hero is a man who does not take all this hubble-bubble for more than it is worth. / He preserves an exasperating good humour through it, however energetic his retorts may be, because he reckons on human nature being moved, in the long run, only by a few fundamental considerations and instincts. / The hostility which he excites does not therefore trouble him the least. He counts upon the phenomenon, ultimately working in his favour, that puzzles Tanner in himself when confronted with Ann ; that is, upon the contradiction between moral judgments and instinctive likings and respect. Valentine is not dismayed by Gloria's disapproval, nor Bluntschli by Raina's contempt for his lack of conventionally soldier-like qualities ; both are confident that the ultimate decisions of these ladies will depend on other things. Even Tanner soon finds himself on excellent terms with Roebuck Ramsden, who began by abusing him as an infamous fellow. But it is not only the fact, that the confidence of the "realists" is always justified in the plays, which emphasizes the instability of human emotions and judgments ; it is one of the fundamental assumptions with regard to human nature which lie at the back of the plays themselves. It is one of the chief causes, too, why they are regarded as fantastic ; for the normal instability of emotion has hitherto found very little reflection in literature or on the stage ; vacillations, flaggings, changes of mind and inconsequences of thought having been generally confined to characters intended to be obviously weak. But Mr. Shaw represents, quite truly, characters of considerable firmness in many respects as subject to them.

In common with all writers of comedy he depends for his effects upon the contradictions between what people say they believe and how they act; but for his surprises and fun he draws more than most writers on the normal instability of feeling.

A great deal of comedy rests upon the weakness of emotions and aspirations in conflict with the instincts and necessities; a hungry lover, for instance, thinking more of his breakfast than his mistress, is a comic figure; so is an indignant husband being petted into acquiescence. But whether we laugh happily or not at such scenes, depends upon the spirit in which they are treated. If this spirit is one of censure and contempt for the weakness of emotion, the scene becomes satire at once; but if the scene is presented in such a way that we recognize the infirmity of human nature, which nevertheless still seems lovable, it remains comedy; and comedy may include anything from the most boisterous fun to the tenderest irony. / Mr. Shaw's plays are a curious mixture between comedy and satire. / The spirit that prevails in them is usually one of remorseless scrutiny into the sincerity and consistency of emotions and motives, and therefore one of satire; but the severity of the decision in each individual case is considerably mitigated by the fact that practically every one else is also found guilty, so that the general impression is that of comedy. He puzzles people by appearing at the same time very hard on human nature, and very indulgent to it. His own explanation of the matter is that his ethics are different from the current morality. He says, in effect, "If I were to judge you all by the standards your own conscience sets up, which by the bye you are always revoking with extraordinary inconsistency, I should have to condemn you all as more or less worthless; however, I do not judge you according to these principles, but by others of my own."

What these are will become clearer when we are examining the plays one by one.

Meanwhile, if "ira" is represented in these plays as a "brevis furor," what is "amor"? In his preface to Man and Superman, Mr. Shaw says that "though we have plenty of dramas with heroes and heroines who are in love and must accordingly marry or perish at the end of the play, or about people whose relations with one another have been complicated by the marriage laws, not to mention the looser sort of plays which trade on the tradition that illicit love affairs are at once vicious and delightful, we have no modern English plays in which the natural attraction of the sexes for one another is made the mainspring of the action. . . . What is the usual formula for such plays? A woman has on some past occasion been brought into conflict with the law that regulates the relations of the sexes. A man by falling in love with her, or marrying her, is brought into conflict with the social convention which discountenances the woman. Now the conflicts of individuals with law and convention can be dramatized like all other human conflicts; but they are purely judicial." The reason why such plays are usually so depressing and uninteresting, he argues, is that they are at bottom utterly sexless. We are really more interested in the relations between the man and the woman, which are slurred over, than in the relations between both and the law.

Elsewhere,¹ however, he has complained that the attraction of the sexes for one another has been made far too much of as "the mainspring of the action ;" everything the hero ever does being represented as done for the sake of the woman he loves. His quarrel with modern English dramatists is then, first, that they represent a passion which is only all-powerful in day-dreams as pervasively effective in practical affairs ; and secondly, that they do not represent the nature of this passion directly and frankly. His own plays are not open to either objection. In Man and Superman he set out purposely to write a play in which sexual attraction should be the main interest ; but in his other plays also he has always made the nature of the attraction between his characters quite clear. What is remarkable about the scenes in which this is done, is the extent to which sexual passion is isolated from all other sentiments and emotions. His lovers, instead of using the language of admiration and affection, in which this passion is so often cloaked, simply convey by their words the kind of mental tumult they are in. Sexual attraction is stripped bare of all the accessories of poetry and sympathy. It is represented as it is by itself, with its own peculiar romance, but with none of the feelings which may, and often do, accompany it. Take for example the scene between Valentine and Gloria in You Never Can Tell.

¹ The Preface to Plays for Puritans.

GLORIA (uneasily, rising). Let us go back to the beach.

VALENTINE (darkly—looking up at her). What ! you feel it too ?

GLORIA. Feel what ?

VALENTINE. Dread.

GLORIA. Dread !

VALENTINE. As if something were going to happen. It came over me suddenly just before you proposed that we should run away to the others.

GLORIA (amazed). That's strange—very strange! I had the same presentiment.

VALENTINE. How extraordinary! (Rising). Well: shall we run away?

GLORIA. Run away! Oh no: that would be childish. (She sits down again. He resumes his seat beside her, and watches her with a gravely sympathetic air. She is thoughtful and a little troubled as she adds) I wonder what is the scientific explanation of those fancies that cross us occasionally!

VALENTINE. Ah, I wonder! It's a curiously helpless sensation: isn't it?

GLORIA (rebelling against the word). Helpless?

VALENTINE. Yes. As if Nature, after allowing us to belong to ourselves and do what we judged right and reasonable for all these years, were suddenly lifting her great hand to take us—her two little children—by the scruffs of our little necks, and use us, in spite of ourselves, for her own purposes, in her own way.

VALENTINE. . . . Oh, I know you mustn't tell me whether you like me or not: but—

GLORIA (her principles up in arms at once). Must not? Why not? I am a free woman: why should I not tell you?

VALENTINE (pleading in terror and retreating). Don't. I'm afraid to hear.

GLORIA (no longer scornful). You need not be afraid. I think you are sentimental and a little foolish; but I like you.

VALENTINE (dropping into the iron chair as if crushed). Then it's all over. (He becomes the picture of despair.)

GLORIA (puzzled, approaching him). But why?

VALENTINE. Because liking is not enough. Now that I think down into it seriously, I don't know whether I like you or not.

GLORIA (looking down at him with wondering concern). I'm sorry.

VALENTINE (in an agony of restrained passion). Oh, don't pity me. Your voice is tearing my heart to pieces. Let me alone, Gloria. You go down into the very depths of me, troubling and stirring me—I can't struggle with it—I can't tell you—

GLORIA (breaking down suddenly). Oh, stop telling me what you feel: I can't bear it.

VALENTINE (springing up triumphantly, the agonized voice now solid, ringing and jubilant). Ah, it's come at last—my moment of courage. (He seizes her hands: she looks at him in terror.) Our moment of courage! (He draws her to him, and kisses her with impetuous strength, and laughs boyishly.) Now you've done it, Gloria. It's all over: we're in love with one another. (She can only gasp at him.) But what a dragon you were! And how hideously afraid I was!

Turn now to the final scene between Ann and Tanner:

TANNER. The will is yours then! The trap was laid from the beginning.

ANN (concentrating all her magic). From the beginning—from our childhood—for both of us—by the Life Force.

TANNER. I will not marry you. I will not marry you.

ANN. Oh, you will, you will.

TANNER. I tell you, no, no, no.

ANN. I tell you, yes, yes, yes.

TANNER. No.

ANN (coaxing—imploring—almost exhausted). Yes. Before it is too late for repentance. Yes.

TANNER (struck by the echo from the past). When did all this happen to me before? Are we two dreaming?

ANN (suddenly losing her courage, with an anguish that she does not conceal). No. We are awake; and you have said no: that is all.

TANNER (brutally). Well?

ANN. Well, I made a mistake: you do not love me.

TANNER (seizing her in his arms). It is false: I love you. The Life Force enchants me: I have the whole world in my arms when I clasp you. But I am fighting for my freedom, my honor, for my self, one and indivisible.

/In both these scenes sexual attraction is isolated and separated from feelings of affection and admiration./ The only difference between them is that Tanner struggles to hold himself back and Valentine goes in headlong. The amorous experiences of the Philanderer, of Blanche and

Trench (Widowers' Houses), of Frank and Vivie (Mrs Warren's Profession) are treated in exactly the same manner; only in these cases the lover does not analyze or understand his own emotion. This emotion must be distinguished from lust on the one hand, and from love on the other; for in the first place, it is imaginative as well as sensual, an excitement of the mind as well as of the body—of the whole living being in fact—and, in the second, it does not include a desire for the other person's welfare, nor the conscious contemplation of what is good. Valentine and Tanner know that it is a brief or very intermittent emotion, that it has nothing to do with a perception of the beauty of mind or character; hardly, in Tanner's case, with a perception of bodily beauty: Ann's looks were not the kind of beauty which signified much to him. Like his prototype Don Juan when in love, his ear and eye probably tore her voice and looks to pieces; like him he could say, "My judgment was not corrupted: my brain still said no on every issue. And whilst I was in the act of framing my excuses to the lady, Life seized me and threw me into her arms as a sailor throws a scrap of fish into the mouth of a sea-bird."¹

The merit of all these scenes is that they convey with perfect clearness the emotion which possesses the characters so that it is recognized at once as a real one, and one which has been sentimentally identified with other emotions to the devastation of literature and the confusion of life. The artistic merit of such work requires no comment, and its social importance lies in helping people to distinguish better between their emotions and therefore to walk more surefootedly through life. But at this point Mr. Shaw's peculiar bias comes in. His principal intellectual failing, so it seems to me, is to exaggerate the stupidity of mankind. No other writer, not even Carlyle or Tolstoi, appears so convinced that the mistakes and confusions of thought, of which men are guilty, are an absurd, glaring, staring set of elementary blunders. So with regard to the emotion of love, he says in so many words—"You have idealized and sentimentalized love. I will show you what that emotion is. Come, rub your eyes ; look at it ; isn't that what you mean by "being in love? Have you the folly to say now that it is worth more than anything else in the world?" And we look, and admit we have often called precisely that emotion "being in love," and that it was never better represented ; but we feel, especially now we see it so clearly, it was not that emotion after all to which we gave such importance, but that there is still something very difficult to define to which this value justly belongs. Nor do we mean then by love the impartial sympathy and kindness which Lady Cecily Waynflete feels towards every one she meets ; that is a rare and beautiful quality, and very romantic when it is so constant as it is in her, but that is not it. What Cusins is indicated as feeling in Major Barbara is much more like it ; but notice now where Mr. Shaw's bias comes in. He sums up Cusins's feelings for Barbara by saying, "By the operation of some instinct which is not merciful enough to blind him with the illusions of love, he is obstinately bent on marrying her." As an artist, he has put into their behaviour together a great deal more than this ; but as a writer of analytical stage-directions and philosophic prefaces, he will not admit that it is more than a case of Tanner and Ann or Valentine and Gloria over again. It is perfectly clear that Cusins, while as a critical observer he may be quite aware of Barbara's faults, and while he is attracted to her instinctively, also feels that happiness in the contemplation of her mind and character and the expression of them in her person, which is included in the common conception of love. But Mr. Shaw's contempt for the shoddy confusions of passionate literature, his knowledge of the ease with which men deceive themselves at these junctures, and his constant prejudice that the ordinary view must be hopelessly beside the point, lead him as a philosophical critic to ignore emotional complications, which as an artist he here reflects in his work ; and these complications, carried vaguely in the ordinary man's mind, prevent him from being satisfied by Mr. Shaw's demonstration that love between the sexes has little or no value in itself, and no significance except as a trustworthy indication that the offspring of that particular union are likely to be sound.

¹ Don Juan in Hell (Act III. of Man and Superman as published).

I have discussed the treatment of the emotions as exhibited in these plays at some length, and especially those of love and sexual attraction ;/because one general impression which Mr. Shaw's work leaves behind is that of a loveless world in which actions, which seem the result of affection, are explained as having other causes./ On nearer inspection this impression appears to be due to the natural trend of his powers rather than to limitations of feeling. His mission is not to glorify what is best in human nature, but to make men scrutinize their pretensions, their emotions, and their conscience. He satirizes rather their virtues and the emotions of which they are proud than the faults to which they would cry "peccavi."

But he is apt to weaken his case by ignoring the sound element in the emotions and qualities he attacks, and sometimes we find him honouring in one place the very quality he attacked elsewhere as a vice masquerading as a virtue. For instance, he attacks (in Major Barbara) the emotion of sympathy for suffering and helplessness which he honours in Captain Brassbound's Conversion. Perhaps he would say that Barbara and Lady Cecily did not feel pity; but without compassion, their kindness would have been more patronizing and less effectual than the sentimental pity he detests as insufferably morbid and condescending. Again, he jeers at unselfishness, exhorting every man to fight for his own hand irrespective of consequences to others in the one play; and in the other he explains the secret of power as a forgetfulness of self. True, the unselfishness he attacks is part humbug and part feebleness, the kind which make a person a nuisance by compelling all who have to do with him to look after his interests as well as their own; and what Mr. Shaw means is simply that you must help yourself, if you are to help others. But he does not give his fellow-men the credit for seeing these distinctions, and he thinks apparently that they will only take the lesson if he ignores them himself for the sake of emphasis. He asserts that forgiveness is a disastrous principle, and in the same book advocates that every man, whatever he may have done, should have the chance of being treated as though he were still capable of decent conduct and feelings, which is the essence of forgiveness. He pours contempt on humility as a kind of perverted emotional luxury or shirking, and yet one of the qualities for which he shows most sympathy is the sense of proportion that makes a man consider his own emotional struggles and catastrophes, or even his own moral progress and refinement, as after all of small consequence compared to the total effect of his conduct in a world bursting with misery. What is this if it is not humility? These contradictions do not spring from a confused view of life; but from the persuasion that he is writing for a world of fools, who are so dense and inert, that they can only be startled into attention; who, being incapable of keeping separate things distinct, are also incapable of being moved by anything but emphatic one-sided statement. It is this conviction which mars much of his work; for it is not true. The ordinary man feels many more distinctions than he can express. Though he may be unable always to refute Mr. Shaw, he does feel that a great many important things have been left out in dealing with human nature and society, and therefore he is inclined to ignore him as a maker of paradoxes, or merely to enjoy him as a wit. If Mr. Shaw had felt more constantly the truth of his own maxim: "The difference between the shallowest routiner and the deepest thinker appears, to the latter, trifling; to the former, infinite"—for presumably the thinker sees the truth in this matter also: better than the ordinary man—his work would have been more convincing. Nevertheless, the influence of clearness and emphatic presentation, and of a point of view extremely well stated, must always be wide. It is a great thing to have a side of things so vividly expressed that you can turn to the author at any time in confidence that you will find in him its most absolute and forcible expression. It is one of the chief causes of lasting reputation. As to Mr. Shaw's influence upon his contemporaries, this is best measured by noting how frequently in reading or talking you come across a view of things, which makes you think, "I wonder whether that is derived from Bernard Shaw ;" or by a still subtler test, by watching how often in your private ruminations upon some experience or other the suggestion crosses your mind, "Was my view of my own feelings coloured by such and such a scene in Shaw's plays or novels ?" You may say "Yes—and a reason for distrusting it ;" but whether you say that, or whether you marvel at his insight, the fact that the idea occurs at all is a sign that he is an author of real significance.

CHAPTER IV

CANDIDA

CANDIDA was first produced at the Court Theatre on April 26, 1904. Miss Janet Achurch and Mr. Charrington had taken it round the provinces some years before. The most striking feature in the Court performance was Mr. Granville Barker's acting of the poet, Eugene Marchbanks; excepting this, and the acting of Miss Sydney Fairbrother, who represented perfectly the pert, self-respecting honesty and suppressed sentimental devotion of the little cockney typist, it was not better than the earlier rendering.

Candida is the story of the love of a poet, age eighteen for a practical, clear-headed, sympathetic woman, who has been married some years to a hard-working, socialistic clergyman, with a tremendous gift for moral exhortation. He is a perfectly sincere man, in the sense that he has never uttered a word which he did not honestly believe to be sincere at the time. But in order to get the maximum energy out of himself he has avoided probing himself or examining his relations towards others. His habitual behaviour and utterances would come therefore under the head of what Carlyle called "sincere cant." He is certainly a good man, and believes himself to be a strong one. He is devoted to his wife, who returns his affection; but he regards himself as her protector, and the adoration with which his fellow-workers look up to him, and the influence he wields from platform and pulpit have blinded him to the fact that he is really the weaker of the two. She, on the other hand, is well aware of this, and it increases her love for him to feel he needs her help.

Into this household comes the poet, who is so sensitive to the attitudes of the people towards him and the emotional atmosphere of the moment, that he is almost helpless in practical matters. He is a shrinking, embarrassed creature, who appeals to Candida's tenderness at first as an adorer, whom she can shelter and protect. But she soon becomes aware of a side of him which goes near to alarming her once or twice, just as it disturbs poor "Prossy," and ends by terrifying Morell. In fact, it would frighten her too, were she not at bottom the most matter-of-fact of the four. Candida has a good deal of George Sand in her. She has a great admiration for intense emotion and poetic sensibility; but you feel that the only things she really believes in are the obvious things, which plain people value most, a happy fire-side, hard regular work and practical kindness. There is, really, no plumbing the depths of her condescension towards the ideals of a poet. Marchbanks appeals to her as Chopin and De Musset appealed to George Sand; while thinking that she sympathizes with him completely, she really only sympathizes in so far as she can mother and comfort him. Nevertheless, she is immensely grateful to him for understanding her situation, and enjoys his adoration without being moved by it. She realizes at the end that he must stand alone; for, like all true poets, he is incorruptibly sincere and courageous in facing the extent of his longings, and he will not allow them to be satisfied with less than ambrosial food. Living in a world of emotions, and understanding them, he is strong when others are weak. The Rev. James Morell begins by laughing patronizingly at what he considers a case of calf-love—and, too, he feels so sure of Candida. The dialogue between them is one of the truest and most spirited Mr. Shaw has written. It is magnificent.

Morell rapidly begins to realize that this love is something more serious than he expected; and still sonorously self-complacent, though keeping up with more and more difficulty an attitude of brotherly forbearance, he proceeds to crush the poet with lofty reproaches and moral harangues, which, alas, have a fatal platform ring about them. They are powerful enough in their way (Mr. Shaw does not secure the poet's victory by undermining his adversary beforehand), but they are nothing to the terrible directness of Marchbank's retorts. Every one makes a breach in the parson's self-confidence which hitherto he thought justly based and impregnable. But his habit of attacking others from the pulpit has unfitted him for a close-quarters grapple with an adversary whose sincerity is profounder than his own. He begins to feel his own weakness, and the fear seizes him that perhaps the poet is right, and that when rousing meetings to enthusiasm by his emotional oratory his wife may have despised him in her heart. He loses self-control and shakes Marchbanks by the collar, who screams in nervous terror.

MARCHBANKS. . . . (Morell grasps him powerfully by the lapel of his coat: he cowers down on the sofa and screams passionately.) Stop, Morell : if you strike me I'll kill myself : I won't bear it. (Almost in hysterics.) Let me go. Take your hand away.

MORELL (with slow emphatic scorn). You little snivelling cowardly whelp. (He releases him.) Go, before you frighten yourself into a fit.

MARCHBANKS (on the sofa, gasping, but relieved by the withdrawal of Morell's hand). I'm not afraid of you : it's you who are afraid of me.

MORELL (quietly, as he stands over him). It looks like it, doesn't it?

MARCHBANKS (with petulant vehemence). Yes, it does. (Morell turns away contemptuously. Eugene scrambles to his feet and follows him.) You think because I shrink from being brutally handled—because (with tears in his voice) I can do nothing but cry with rage when I am met with violence—because I can't lift a heavy trunk down from the top of a cab like you—because I can't fight you for your wife as a navvy would : all that makes you think I am afraid of you. But you're wrong. If I haven't got what you call British pluck, I haven't British cowardice either : I'm not afraid of a clergyman's ideas. I'll fight your ideas. I'll rescue her from her slavery to them : I'll pit my own ideas against them. You are driving me out of the house because you daren't let her choose between your ideas and mine. You are afraid to let me see her again. (Morell, angered, turns suddenly on him. He flies to the door in involuntary dread.) Let me alone, I say. I'm going.

MORELL (with cold scorn). Wait a moment. I'm not going to touch you : don't be afraid. When my wife comes back she will want to know why you have gone. And when she finds that you are never going to cross our threshold again, she will want to have that explained too. Now I don't wish to distress her by telling her that you have behaved like a blackguard.

MARCHBANKS (coming back with renewed vehemence). You shall—you must. If you give any explanation but the true one, you are a liar and a coward. Tell her what I said ; and how you were strong and manly, and shook me as a terrier shakes a rat ; and how I shrank and was terrified ; and how you called me a snivelling little whelp and put me out of the house. If you don't tell, I will : I'll write it to her.

MORELL (taken aback). Why do you want her to know this ?

MARCHBANKS (with lyric rapture). Because she will understand me, and know that I understand her. If you keep back one word of it from her—if you are not ready to lay the truth at her feet as I am—then you will know to the end of your days that she really belongs to me and not to you. Good-bye.

MORELL (terribly disquieted). Stop : I will not tell her.

MARCHBANKS (turning near the door). Either the truth or a lie you must tell her if I go.

MORELL (temporizing). Marchbanks : it is sometimes justifiable——

MARCHBANKS (cutting him short). I know—to lie. It will be useless. Good-bye, Mr. Clergyman. (As he turns finally to the door, it opens, and Candida enters in her housekeeping dress.)

There are no explanations for the present. In the last act Morell and the poet confront her together, and demand that she shall choose between them. Candida with ironical acquiescence consents, and proposes that they should make their bids for her. Her husband in the vein of proud, manly humility offers her his strength for her protection, his honesty of purpose for her surety, his industry for her living, etc.

CANDIDA (quite quietly). And you, Eugene? What do you offer?

MARCHBANKS. My weakness ! my desolation ! my heart's need !

CANDIDA. That's a good bid, Eugene. Now I know how to make my choice—— and she chooses "the weaker." Morell collapses, thinking it is all over, but the poet knows in a moment that the sentence has gone against him.

The play ends with an explanation from Candida why Morell is weak and Eugene strong. The poet goes away without bitterness, and husband and wife fall into each other's arms. But, we are told, that neither of them know the secret which is in the poet's heart. This secret, however, is easy to divine ; it is the knowledge that the love which those two have for each other is not what he wants or envies, or, to put it prosaically, it is a contempt for roseate domesticity.

The play is among the best Mr. Shaw has written. The interest is concentrated on the main theme throughout, and it finishes at the point from which the audience, looking back, can best understand all that has happened, which cannot be said of his last two plays. It is the first play to show what is becoming more and more obvious in his writings, that, in addition to the rationalistic point of view from which he criticizes conventions and social institutions, he looks on the world from another, which is defiantly and ruthlessly idealistic. As a socialist, he is always attempting to prove that social and moral conventions must be broken up and changed because they do not lead to human happiness; but his favourable judgment of individuals depends upon the extent to which they despise and dispense with happiness themselves. In personal relations, in love, he apparently sees little value; love is a comfort, a consoling kind of happiness, which a great man can do without; when he is tired and discouraged he may crave for it; but these are his feebler moments. At his best he is self-sufficient; content in the place of happiness with a kind of occasional triumphant gaiety, springing from a sense of his own fortitude and power. In the later plays which we shall examine, we shall find him recognizing this as fundamentally a religious emotion, and trying to find the view of the universe which justifies and explains it. Meanwhile it is worth noting that the poet is the first character of this kind, who is used as a touchstone to test the metal of the others. Mr. Granville Barker succeeded in playing Eugene Marchbanks where almost every other actor would have failed, because the representation of a lyrical mood is one within the peculiar range of his powers. His voice, too, can express a contemplative ecstasy. It possesses a curious individual quality, which, while it limits the range of his impersonations, gives particular intensity to some. When he repeats her name "Candida, Candida, Candida," there is not a touch of self-consciousness in the musical reiteration; he does not appear to be following the sound of his own voice like most actors at such times, but to be listening, detached, to his longing made audible.

It is in his representation of intellectual emotions that he excels, and so he excels in this part. Miss Kate Rorke was Candida to perfection in her capacity, promptitude, width of mind and patronage and kindliness; but she left out Candida's smiles, her irony, her maternity, and the charm of her perfect self-control. Mr. C. V. France (I did not see Mr. McKinnel) as James Morell did not give sufficiently the impression of a character with a large emotional surface. Morell's thoughtfulness for others, too, though it had become largely a mechanical habit, must have always had more of the actor's perennial impetuosity about it. Nor did Mr. France give the impression of a man who is readily excited by his own words and attitudes, which Morell the orator certainly was. His performance as the parson in The Convict on the Hearth was a better one, though his Morell was far from being insignificant.

JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND

If Candida is one of the best of Mr. Shaw's plays for the completeness with which it contains and finishes its story, John Bull's Other Island is remarkable for being equally successful for entirely different reasons. / It is a play with hardly any story, with no climax, without the vestige of a plot, and without anything like an ending, in fact without one of the qualities of the "well-constructed" play; yet it is nevertheless an absolute success. The story is simply that of two friends and partners, an Irishman and an Englishman, who visit the former's old home in order to fore-close a mortgage. Incidentally, the Englishman determines to stand for the local seat, and becomes engaged, with his friend's approval, to a young woman with whom the latter had been on rather romantic terms for a short time before starting on his career. / That is all: could anything sound more unpromising? There is not even a touch of jealousy to offer a chance for dramatic effect. / The interest lies solely in the presentation of character and in the contrast between temperaments; but this is achieved in a masterly fashion. The play has the one æsthetic technical quality, which is necessary to its perfection; the characters are developed by means of a perfectly natural sequence of events; there is no appearance of circumstances being created for the sake of exhibiting them; everything that happens has the air of happening by chance.

Every critic of this play must stop on the threshold of his comments to remark, with whatever emphasis he can command, that the performance itself was one of the best ever given in London. There were faults, of course, but they are only worth mentioning, if this fact is remembered.

Mr. Shaw has explained in his preface to the play what he conceives to be the main difference between the Englishman and the Irishman. The Irishman is more imaginative, but he has no illusions about matters of fact; while the Englishman is at the mercy of such imagination as he possesses, and has in consequence a confused sentimental conception of reality. The Duke of Wellington, according to him, is a typical Irishman, while Nelson is typically English. This difference in temperament he attributes not to race (he does not believe in race) but to the climate. These discussions about national characteristics make very good conversation, but it is hard to feel satisfied with the conclusions; for the exceptions are too numerous. For instance, according to Mr. Shaw's theory, you would expect to find that such Englishmen as Fielding, Defoe, Cobbett, Gissing, Samuel Butler, had been brought up in the soft moist air and among the brown bogs and heather of Rosscullen, and that such Irishmen as Goldsmith and Steele, who were so full of romantic sentiment about actualities and dearly loved a fool (which Mr. Shaw says is almost impossible for an Irishman) had never even been to Ireland. But whether the theory propounded in the preface is true or not, in the play Larry Doyle and Broadbent are extraordinarily vivid characters, who recall familiar types of Irishmen and Englishmen. The contrast between the two is most striking at the following points. Broadbent is full of "heart," and takes himself and everything he does and every one he meets absolutely seriously; he has no sense of humour, or of refinement, or of proportion. Larry is discriminative to the point of chilly fastidiousness; he cannot enjoy life and he cannot idealize any human being: he cannot love, though he is fond of Tom Broadbent because Tom's warmth of emotion helps him to feel things are worth while at the moment, and because his nature is essentially practical and active, while Larry himself is only capable of being moved by ideals in which he does not believe. He is exasperated by this tendency in himself to feel only the beauty and significance of things which do not exist in any satisfying quantities; hence the bitterness of his contempt for romance and mysticism. His life is a perpetual struggle to get used to the world; it is a point of pride with him not to feel an exile here; hence his enthusiasm for the big international world of shipping, engineering and business, into which he has escaped from his dreams and thoughts in poverty-stricken Rosscullen. But business does not really fill him with enthusiasm, and he knows it; hence his fierce dislike of Father Keegan, who, with the same heart-sickness in him, has taken the opposite course, and turned away from reality to live in contemplation of a far-off perfection. Larry feels, as keenly as Father Keegan, the futility and vulgarity of Broadbent's schemes; but he fights fiercely for them because anything seems more tolerable than the helplessness of a visionary's protest against the world.

Mr. J. L. Shine's Larry was not so good as many of the other parts; but he did give the impression of loneliness and distraction of heart and of perpetual tension of will to keep turned towards one path in life, which are far the most important characteristics to represent in Larry.

Broadbent, on the other hand, talks with the most reverential enthusiasm of Ruskin and Shelley (whose works he was very fond of reading, he says, as a boy), and he listens in the same spirit to the discourses of Keegan ; but there is a profounder disrespect implied in his admiration than in Larry's impatience ; for Broadbent is absolutely incapable of really believing in such things ; the works of Ruskin and Shelley are merely pots of romantic paint to him, wherein he finds colours with which to daub his own undertakings.

Mr. Louis Calvert's Broadbent was a masterpiece of acting. It is seldom that a character so thoroughly homogeneous in gesture, voice, and carriage is seen on the stage. Mr. Shaw's description of him runs as follows : "a robust, full-blooded, energetic man in the prime of life, sometimes eager and credulous, sometimes shrewd and roguish, sometimes portentously solemn, sometimes jolly and impetuous, always buoyant and irresistible, mostly likable ; and enormously absurd in his most earnest moments." Mr. Calvert was all this to the life. The meeting between Broadbent and Nora Reilly by the round tower, on the first night of his arrival at Rosscullen, when his romantic feelings are so strange to himself, that he accepts Nora's suggestion he is drunk, with shame and conviction, is a delicious bit of comedy. His subsequent wooing of Nora and his easy triumph was a painful spectacle, for Nora is a charming person ; but the scene is distressingly plausible.

Mr. Barker as Father Keegan did not quite succeed in inspiring the sense of remote dignity which it is important to emphasize in contrast to the eupeptic irreverence of Broadbent and to the squalid go-as-you-please Irish characters.

How good they all were! Corney Doyle (Mr. F. Cremlin) with his drawling manner and calculating eye; Father Dempsey (Mr. Beveridge) with unction, authority, and familiarity so perfectly blended in his manner; Barney Doran (Mr. Wilfred Shine), the clever sloven with plenty of heartiness and no heart; and Mat Haffigan (Mr. A. E. George), that gnarled old stump of dogged density! Miss Ellen O'Mally's Nora had a genuine poetic charm, a quality which hardly ever crosses the footlights.

YOU NEVER CAN TELL

The story of this play is so small a part of it, that it is not worth while telling; the interest lies entirely in the characters. You Never Can Tell has proved one of the most popular of Mr. Shaw's plays, partly because its peculiar wit and high spirits communicate to the spectator's mind a kind of dancing freedom; and partly because the criticism in it upon social distinctions, the family, and the conventions of courtship, instead of being hurled in truculent harangues across the foot-lights, is conveyed indirectly during the course of the story—and, lastly, because the whole play is tinged with the serene resignation of the gentle refrain, "You never can tell, sir, you never can tell."

Connoisseurs are tiresome with their definitions of true comedy, when the upshot of them is that nothing can be comedy unless it is very like what has already been written. Mr. Shaw's plays may or may not be comedy; their pervading spirit is certainly rather one of scrutiny than of indulgence, and humanity on his stage is always under the stare of a terrible eye ; but whether the presence of these qualities in his work settle the question or not, it is clear that You Never Can Tell approaches more nearly than the others to what every one considers comedy.

How delightful is William the waiter ! The "silky old man, white-haired and delicate looking, but so cheerful and contented that in his encouraging presence ambition stands rebuked as vulgarity and imagination as treason to the abounding sufficiency and interest of the actual." How beautifully Mr. Calvert played him ! He gathered the tea-cups with the tenderness of a lady picking flowers in her garden ; he proffered coats and parasols with a concern untouched by servility, but profoundly absurd ; his voice was like oil on troubled waters ; he was the personification of that sense of the importance of the moment, which, emphasized, is the source of the most delicious irony. What a dissertation might be written upon William ! William the leveller, William the impassive, William the imperturbably, universally kind ! His kinship to Mother Earth might be shown ; he might be compared to the over-arching blue, which dwarfs frantic gesticulations and is no sounding-board for violent declaimers. One cannot help regretting that his spirit does not more often brood over the plays of Mr. Shaw.

The love interest in this play has already been discussed in connection with Mr. Shaw's general treatment of that theme ; but it is worth while insisting again upon its main feature. Love appears as an impulse which cannot be rationalized, only explained. The state of falling in love is, according to this theory, one that a clear-headed man will recognize as a kind of dream, in which individuals have a value his wide-awake judgment would never allow them. That is to say, it makes complete nonsense of life. In his later plays Mr. Shaw justifies it on the ground of a faith in the purposes of nature, of "the Life Force"; in this one, Valentine, unlike Tanner who philosophizes upon it, recklessly enjoys its exhilaration, though he knows it may land him where he has no wish to be. When Gloria, like Ann, turns round to hold her lover, who when it comes to the point would be half glad to get off, it was curious to note that the audience always roared with laughter, just as they did at the tremendous moment in the last act of Man and Superman. If this jars on those who see the serious intention of the author, how trying it must be to the actors themselves.

The Twins, who are so delightful to the reader, never quite came up to expectation on the stage. High spirits and spontaneous fun are extraordinarily difficult to act; especially when they take the form of a boyish burlesque of sententiousness. The Twins are always acting up to a comic conception of themselves; it is very hard for the actors to represent two young creatures doing this naturally. The fault I had to find with the playing of Miss Dorothy Minto and Mr. Page is that they did not always exhibit enough the physical signs of the animal spirits which prompt their irrepressible comments. The rollicking tirades about their twentieth-century mother and Gloria, in the first act, did not quite come off for this reason. In Miss Minto, who was so admirable in the quarrel with her father, I missed the flash of teeth and eyes in smiling, which I imagine to have been one of the characteristics which made the assaults of the real Dolly so flabbergasting; but when she was momentarily suppressed she was excellent. Mr. Page often lacked vivacity. But certainly this want is better than the over-acting the part easily invites.

Miss Watson brought out the unamiable platform side of Mrs. Clandon. You could imagine how carefully just she always tried to be to her children ; but you missed the indulgent generous quality in her, which was so remarkable in Mrs. Wright's impersonation, making the family much more conceivable as a family, and Mrs. Clandon's implacable attitude to her husband much more interesting. Owing to this peculiarity in Miss Watson's finished acting, the scene in which the Twins, after trying to get out of their mother the name of their father, go over to her side against Gloria, did not seem significant.

Mr. Edmund Gurney, as Crampton, cut as unamiably grotesque a figure as he ought. He was wonderfully unattractive, and, when he climbed down and dropped the domineering father, like all unattractive cross-grained people trying to conciliate affection, he became pitiable. There was real pathos in the pleading glances of his dazed and choleric little eye, in the movements of his mouth, as though he found consideration for others a bitter draught, and in the clumsy, checked gestures of his tenderness. Mr. James Hearn as Bohun used a fine hectoring voice ; but he emphasized already too frequent repetitions of his part by a monotonous shaking of his finger at the individual to be put down.

The part of Valentine was played on different occasions by Mr. Granville Barker and Mr. Ainley. The latter's was a very fair performance, but he did not express well the gaiety and violence which are part of Valentine's character. Where

Mr. Barker excelled was precisely in those brisk leaps of the heart, which are so characteristic of Mr. Shaw's lovers; for instance, in such a passage as this, at the end of an interview during which Gloria has been very scornful.

VALENTINE. Love can't give any man new gifts. It can only heighten the gifts he was born with.

GLORIA. What gifts were you born with, pray?

VALENTINE. Lightness of heart.

GLORIA. And lightness of head, and lightness of faith, and lightness of everything that makes a man.

VALENTINE. Yes, the whole world is like a feather dancing in the light now, and Gloria is the sun. I beg your pardon; I'm off. Back at nine. Good-bye.

Mr. Barnes' Finch McComas was a most delightful piece of comedy. Finch in his youth was an ardent reformer; when he appears on the stage he is an eminently respectful solicitor. His character bears some analogy to Roebuck Ramsden; they are both 1860 types, only Finch is well aware that his ideas are no longer advanced. He informs Mrs. Clandon, newly arrived from Madeira, that the ideas they upheld together in their youth, for which she is still strenuously prepared to suffer social ostracism, are now perfectly respectable; in fact, that they might be professed by any bishop; only in one place could they possibly be considered as advanced—in the theatre.

MAN AND SUPERMAN

. This play is a tragi-comic love-chase of a man by a woman, It is based on the philosophy of sex already discussed, with this corollary added: that in such matters the woman is always the pursuer, and man the pursued: a corollary obviously untrue, which gains, however, a certain plausibility of appeal both from the fact, which everybody knows though it is sometimes conventionally concealed, that women take love-likings as often as men, and in their own ways seek as often to attain their object, and also from the experience of men who have made love and run away, that the women not unnaturally sometimes run after them. But if the case of Ann and Tanner is taken as an individual case, which it becomes when shorn of preface and appendices on the stage, the general significance which the author attributes to it need not annoy us. The play is the most brilliant piece of work Mr. Shaw has done.

Ann is "Everywoman" according to Mr. Shaw's philosophy; though every woman is not Ann. As an individual character she is excellent. Her instinct leads her to mark down Tanner as the father for her children. / He knows that marriage means loss of liberty, and therefore of efficiency and happiness. He has no respect for Ann's character / and he only approves of her as a philosopher because all impulses, actions and thoughts are subordinated in her to nature's vital purpose.

Jack Tanner, with his explosions of nervous energy and exasperated eloquence, is as good as Ann. The contrasting male character is the poetical, chivalrous, romantic Octavius. He woos Ann, who would never be willing to take him as a husband; for the poetic temperament is barren, "the Life Force passes it by." Marriage, if he only knew, would be equally fatal to him; for his goddess, his inspiration, would vanish in the real "flesh and blood" woman and mother, who is not lovable in herself and in so far as she is "woman" (and Ann is little else) can only really care for her children. | Tanner in the end, as Don Juan explains of himself in the dream, yields because he cannot help it. | He despises Ann ; she is bully and liar, | "and unscrupulously uses her personal fascinations to make men give her what she wants, which makes her something for which there is no polite name." | She will think his aspirations and efforts to reform society absurd, and thwart him as much as she dares ; and, above all, she is a hypocrite. But though Tanner surrenders reluctantly he gives in at last with a good conscience ; | for Ann and he, in submitting to their attraction for each other, become the servants of "the Life Force," or will of the world. Henceforth they are instruments to the creation of the Superman, which is the only aim worth working for in this world ; and they are both right to sacrifice, she her happiness and perhaps her life, he his happiness and aims and generous ambitions ; for such things cannot compare in importance with the bringing into the world of children, born of mutual attraction | But the institution which compels two people who have nothing in common, saving this impulse towards each other, to spend their two lives together, is iniquitous. | The conclusion logically follows from the assertion that the child is the sole end of marriage, is that it is absurd to make marriage binding. | Moreover, the consideration that the rest of life will have to be spent together induces men and women to marry for irrelevant reasons, such as affection or self-interest, to the detriment of subsequent generations. That is the moral of a comedy which keeps many people laughing, who would not laugh if they understood.

Mr. Granville Barker's Tanner was one of his best parts. It was a pity perhaps that he did not make Tanner seem more formidable. Ann's cool audacity and insidious perseverance were admirable, but Miss McCarthy missed one point in the character. Ann after all had some fun in her ; it was perhaps her only redeeming quality from an ordinary point of view ; Miss McCarthy did not suggest this. Mr. Casson as Octavius was finely insignificant. The whole performance was extraordinarily good. Miss Florence Haydon as Mrs. Whitefield and Mr. Gwenn as Straker have identified themselves for ever with these characters in our imaginations. Miss Sarah Brooke as that hard, competent, pretty young woman, Violet Robinson, Mr. Barnes as Roebuck Ramsden, and Miss Agnes Thomas as an acid old maid, all reached that pitch of excellence in their parts which makes a living person start up before the mind's eye afterwards, whenever the name of the character is mentioned.

CAPTAIN BRASSBOUND'S CONVERSION

/The moral of this play is that revenge is silly and vulgar, and justice with retaliatory punishments is only a wilder kind of revenge. / Lady Cecily Waynflete manages and keeps in perfect order the horde of ramshackle banditti, amongst whom she and her brother find themselves, by ignoring their dangerous intentions as childish naughtinesses, and treated every one of them as though they were amiable fellows. Her power springs from absolute fearlessness and a most kindly sympathy, which is not in her an irregular or interrupted impulse, but a constant feeling. She is a gentle, humorous, cheerful, naturally domesticated person, but a very persistent immovable one. To borrow a metaphor, there is in her nature a quality which answers to the fly-wheel in a mill, which distributes the motion equably over all the wheels. She is always telling people what pleasant faces they have and how much she likes them ; and this is how she genuinely feels towards all she meets. The story runs as follows : Sir Howard Hallam, one of His Majesty's judges, and Lady Cecily, his sister-in-law, are taking a holiday tour in Morocco. They are anxious to make an expedition into the interior, a tract of country which is dangerous to Christian travellers, owing to the fanaticism of the Mohammedan tribes. A certain Captain Brassbound, who carries on a dubious coasting trade (really smuggling and piracy), sometimes provides an escort for tourists in this district. In spite of the warnings of the missionary at the coast town, they determine to trust him ; though Lady Cecily is, of course, reluctant to have an escort at all ; such men, she says, always want such a lot of looking after. However, Sir Howard and the missionary are firm on this point, and she resigns herself. She is not the least alarmed when she hears that every native believes that he will go to heaven if he kills an unbeliever, and replies with point, " Bless you, dear Mr. Rankin, the people in England believe that they will go to heaven if they give all their property to the poor. But they don't do it. I'm not a bit afraid of that."

Now Brassbound is really the son of Sir Howard's brother. His mother was a drunken half-crazy woman, who after her husband's death pestered the judge, her brother-in-law, to such an extent that he had an order of restraint made out against her. There was a piece of property, too, in Jamaica, over which there was a long legal dispute; it is now in the judge's hands. The upshot of all this, as far as concerns the position of the characters at the beginning of the play, is that Captain Brassbound, alias "Black Paquito," has been nursing for years a romantic hatred of his uncle, as the murderer and robber of his mother; Sir Howard, of course, never dreams of the relationship between them. It is the captain's intention to revenge his mother by delivering the travellers over to the mercy of the fanatic, Sidi el Assif. But his whole romantic scheme of revenge collapses on closer acquaintance with Lady Cecily. He clings to it desperately because he has invested all his self-respect in the idea that he is a wronged man, who has a great act of reparative justice to perform; but it is no use; her kindness, perfect good faith, and good sense, take the life out of this revenge. He begins by resenting and repulsing her kind actions towards himself and his men; but these are so practical, and are done in so amiable a spirit that he cannot hold out long. There is an explosive scene, of course, between Captain Brassbound and Sir Howard, when the former declares his relationship and resolve, in which Sir Howard speaks up stoutly, declaring that Brassbound may do his worst, but that he and the rest of his gang shall certainly swing for it, while Lady Cecily sits by rather distressed, but quite calm. After this scene follows a dialogue between her and Captain Brassbound, so typical of the delightful serious comedy of the whole play that it must be quoted.

BRASSBOUND. Don't quibble with me. I am going to do my duty as a son ; and you know it.

LADY CECILY. But I should have thought the time for that was in your mother's lifetime, when you could have been kind and forbearing with her. Hurting your uncle won't do her any good, you know.

BRASSBOUND. It will teach other scoundrels to respect widows and orphans. Do you forget that there is such a thing as justice?

LADY CECILY (gaily shaking out the finished coat). Oh, if you are going to dress yourself in ermine and call yourself Justice, I give you up. You are just your uncle over again ; only he gets £5000 a year for it, and you do it for nothing. (She holds the coat up to see if any further repairs are needed.)

BRASSBOUND (sulkily). You twist my words very cleverly. But no man or woman has ever changed me.

LADY CECILY. Dear me ! That must be very nice for the people you deal with, because they can always depend on you ; but isn't it rather inconvenient for yourself when you change your mind ?

BRASSBOUND. I never change my mind.

LADY CECILY (rising with the coat in her hands). Oh ! oh ! Nothing will ever persuade me that you are as pigheaded as that.

BRASSBOUND. (offended). Pigheaded !

LADY CECILY (with quick, caressing apology). No, no, no. I didn't mean that. Firm ! Unalterable ! Resolute ! Ironwilled. Stonewall Jackson. That's the idea, isn't it ?

BRASSBOUND (hopelessly). You are laughing at me.

LADY CECILY. No. Trembling, I assure you. Now will you try this on for me ? I'm so afraid I have made it too tight under the arm. (She holds it behind him.)

BRASSBOUND (obeying mechanically). You take me for a fool, I think. (He misses the sleeve.)

LADY CECILY. No ; all men look foolish when they are feeling for their sleeves—

BRASSBOUND. Agh ! (He turns and snatches the coat from her ; then puts it on himself and buttons the lowest button.)

LADY CECILY (horrified). Stop. No, you must never pull a coat at the skirts, Captain Brassbound ; it spoils the sit of it. Allow me. (She pulls the lapels of his coat vigorously forward.) Put back your shoulders.

(He frowns but obeys.) That's better. (She buttons the top button.) Now button the rest, from the top down. Does it catch you at all under the arm?

BRASSBOUND (miserably—all resistance beaten out of him). No.

LADY CECILY. That's right. Now, before I go back to poor Marzo, say thank you to me for mending your jacket, like a nice polite sailor.

BRASSBOUND (sitting down at the table in great agitation). Damn you! You have belittled my whole life to me. (He bows his head on his hands, convulsed.)

LADY CECILY (quite understanding, and putting her hand kindly on his shoulder). Oh no. I am sure you have done lots of kind things and brave things, if you could only recollect them. With Gordon, for instance? Nobody can belittle that.

But the Sidi is on his way, and Captain Brassbound cannot now prevent his vengeance working itself out. However, an American gun-boat has been warned to keep an eye on the fate of the travellers, and by firing a few guns they succeed in frightening off the fanatics, and Captain Brassbound and his crew are marched off in custody.

The last act is delightful; in it the Captain, dressed by Lady Cecily's orders in her brother's, the Italian ambassador's, top hat and frock coat, looking appallingly stiff and grotesquely smart, comes up for court-martial with his crew. Lady Cecily explains everything away; how the two quarrelled when they found they were related, how well Captain Brassbound behaved; in short, she garbles the events in the most exquisitely ingenious fashion. Of course they are all acquitted. The play ends with Brassbound asking Lady Cecily what he is to do now, since she has knocked the bottom out of his old life. He blurts out a proposal of marriage, and she is almost hypnotized into saying yes; but the signal-gun breaks the spell, and he returns to his ship, glad that he has not persuaded her to sacrifice herself, and confident that he knows what is the secret of influence over men at last—disinterested, fearless sympathy.

The rare merit of the play lies in making you think most seriously of the relations of men to each other and laugh at the same time. / Since Swift no such insistent preacher has so leavened his lesson with laughter. Dickens both preached and laughed, but he stopped laughing the moment he began to preach.

/ The humour in this play hovers perpetually on the edge of that tender emotion which the sight of great kindness and reasonableness stirs. / Nowhere else, except in the second act of Major Barbara, is Mr. Shaw's emotional asceticism so perfectly justified by the results. This distrust of the melting mood is one of his most marked characteristics as a writer, and in a hortatory artist it is a sound instinct. For although men in a softened mood may take a deep impression more easily, such an impression is not likely to recur to them so often afterwards as those received at other times. The reformer does well, in conveying his moral, to aim at creating a mood which is more like those in which men ordinarily make their decisions. One reason why exciting harangues, whether moral or religious or political, influence so little the conduct of men who have nevertheless been deeply moved by them, is that the mood in which they felt the significance of what was said is one which normal circumstances rarely arouse again ; the orator has "taken them out of themselves ;" but the truths perceived when "they were themselves" are never quite forgotten.

The Court Theatre performance was below the usual mark, and not so good as that which the Stage Society gave some years before. It lacked those qualities of proportion and completeness which they have attained in almost every other case. The cast did not pull the play well together. Miss Ellen Terry contributed some delightful touches to the character of Lady Cecily, and all her own charm ; but there was an absence of sureness in her acting sometimes, which spoilt its effect.

Mr. Frederick Kerr, as Brassbound, was not violent and dangerous enough. His attitudes and voice suggested an underlying fund of good nature, which detracts from the impressiveness of Lady Cecily's imperturbable serenity and her conquest of him. His "grrr-s" were guttural enough ; but not sufficiently ferocious. It is important that he should behave with great brutality to her in the second act ; so that completeness of the reaction of compunction, when he is overcome by her sweetness and kind good sense, may seem more natural and moving. Mr. Gwenn as Drinkwater was clever ; but far too exaggerated ; especially when he begs that his penny shockers may be returned to him. Mr. Cremlin made Rankin into a completely live human being. It is extraordinary what reality and solidity he can give to a part, provided it is one which fits his personality. Marzo was played quite perfectly. Johnson was very good : Mr. Edmund Gurney has a genius for reproducing the stolid self-satisfaction of the working-man.

HOW HE LIED TO HER HUSBAND

How he Lied to her Husband is not important. It might be described as a knock-about satire, for farce it is not; and if this description conveys the idea of a somewhat heart-damping entertainment, the impression is correct.

The acting of Miss Gertrude Kingston (She), Mr. Granville Barker (He), and Mr. Poulton (Bompas) was exceptionally good. The knocking-about was not very convincing; but that was inevitable, coming as it did in the middle of careful realistic acting. The characters are as contemptible as they are ridiculous, and yet real enough to make you believe in them. The result is you are on the whole more disgusted than amused; the story is too mean to yield anything but a seedy kind of fun. There are people who consider Maupassant's L'Héritage a good comic story; these may have found How he Lied to her Husband a light-hearted farce.

THE MAN OF DESTINY

This play was disappointing. The psychology appeared machine-made/ and obvious compared with Mr. Shaw's maturer work. Bonaparte is compounded and put together here after the Shavian prescription of a great man of action; the ingredients are nervous energy, unscrupulous determination, vanity well under control of the will, histrionic power, above all indifference towards happiness and a reckless disregard for personal dignity and honour, except when something can be gained from them by using them dramatically. The scene is laid in an Italian inn; the time is soon after the battle of Lodi. Some dispatches which Bonaparte expects have been wheedled out of the young blockhead of an aide-de-camp, by a lady disguised as an Austrian officer. The object of this confidence trick on her part was to prevent a private letter revealing some scandal about Josephine reaching the general.

The lady, after getting possession of the budget, puts up accidentally at the inn where Bonaparte is staying. He soon finds out that the young officer described by his lieutenant and the lady are the same person; and the rest of the play is a struggle for the letters. She is willing to hand them all over except one; he will not hear of this. Finally, he bullies her into yielding them all up; after which he reads the letter in question on the sly, and gives it back intact, as though he had been too magnanimous to read it; for he wishes to ignore the scandal, and the only dignified way of doing so is to pretend he knows nothing. When she discovers this, she is overcome with admiration for the courage which dares to do a mean thing, when it suits so perfectly his purpose. The fatuous young lieutenant is under arrest for having lost the dispatches and threatened with expulsion from the army unless he catches the Austrian who deceived him, which Bonaparte knows is impossible. The lady, however, outwits him by dressing up again as an Austrian officer and delivering herself up. At the end General Bonaparte and she are left alone together.

BONAPARTE (throwing down the letters in a heap on the table). Now! He sits down at the table in a chair he has just placed).

LADY. Yes ; but you know you have the letter in your pocket. (He smiles ; takes a letter from his pocket, and tosses it on top of the heap. She holds it up and looks at him saying) About Cæsar's wife.

BONAPARTE. Cæsar's wife is above suspicion. Burn it.

LADY (taking up the snuffers and holding the letter to the candle flame with it). I wonder would Cæsar's wife be above suspicion if she saw us here together !

BONAPARTE (echoing her, with his elbows on the table and his cheeks on his hands, looking at the letter). I wonder !

Miss Irene Vanbrugh's performance was graceful and spirited. Mr. Dion Boucicault as Bonaparte exaggerated his nervous restlessness. He represented him as merely a little demon of energy with fire-flashes of fury and impatience. But it was not only his fault that so little of Napoleon was represented ; Mr. Shaw himself has not suggested Napoleon's impassable stolidity or his power of investing his laissez-aller moods with the air of profound purpose. One feels that Napoleon would have got those letters without making such a to-do about it.

THE DOCTOR'S DILEMMA

This is not among the best plays. It is a somewhat complicated story, which is made the vehicle of a great deal of hilarious, delightful satire on doctors and of some poor criticism upon the artistic temperament and the place of the artist in society. The story on the face of it looks quite simple : Sir Colenso Ridgeon, the discoverer of an antitoxin remedy for consumption, finds himself with only one vacancy in his sanatorium and two patients. His choice implies a death sentence upon one of them, since the treatment requires his personal supervision—indeed, it is a most dangerous one in other hands. The two sick men are an East End doctor, who is a commonplace honourable man, and a good-for-nothing artist with a real talent. Which life ought he to save? His dilemma is, however, complicated by his having taken a great fancy to the artist's wife. He knows this ought not to influence his decision; nor does it do so directly. But he finds that the wife has no conception that her husband is a worthless fellow; though, it is true, his ways have often landed them both in quandaries which were painful enough. Sooner or later, however, she is bound to find him out—and then what a tragedy for her! This consideration does, apparently, go some way towards deciding the issue in his mind against the artist. I say, apparently, because Ridgeon's motives are not made perfectly clear. This is a defect in the play.

In this dilemma his friend, old Sir Patrick Cullen, is his principal adviser. Sir Patrick is an old-fashioned doctor, a crusty and satisfying character, whose speech is shrewd and kindly, in whom moral work has become at last a kind of intellectual power—a metamorphosis we all have come across in life. When Sir Colenso Ridgeon confesses that his dilemma is complicated by his desire to marry Jennifer Dubedat, in the event of her husband's death, Sir Patrick tells him clearly that he must put that thought out of his mind in deciding; that it is a plain case of good picture or good man. And when Ridgeon, still half hankering after Jennifer, yet half genuinely in doubt, hesitates a preference for good art over good men, Sir Patrick says: "Don't talk your clever rubbish to me." Then with solemnity: "If you live in an age which turns to pictures, plays, and brass bands, because it can find nothing in humanity to ease its poor aching heart, then you may be thankful that you belong to a noble and great profession, whose business it is to heal men and women." Once more, after Dubedat is condemned to death, when Ridgeon explains that the principal consideration which determined him to cure Blenkinsop was that Jennifer might never suffer disillusionment, Sir Patrick's comment blows to shreds with one puff of caustic sense this phantasmal piece of casuistry: "It is rather hard on a young man to kill him simply because his wife has too high an opinion of him—fortunately many of us are not in that position." Ridgeon has made the right decision, but on the wrong grounds. Certainly this old Nestor of the profession has the beau rôle. Mr. William Farren, jun., played him in a way to make one feel, afterwards, that Sir Patrick Cullen must be some one one has known.

The first act takes place in Ridgeon's consulting-room, where five doctors call on him in succession to congratulate him on his knighthood, just conferred. While they are all talking about remedies and discoveries a woman is waiting to see him, and from time to time sends up an urgent request for an interview. Mrs. Dubedat refuses to be put off, and at last, through the entreaties of his old housekeeper, he consents to see her. She is told that her husband cannot be taken in as a patient, since the sanatorium is full. But when she shows some of her husband's drawings, their astonishing merit induces Ridgeon to make every effort to admit him, especially as he likes extremely Jennifer Dubedat herself. He asks her to bring her husband to a dinner at Richmond, where she will meet several eminent men of the profession, and they can all discuss the case together.

In Act II. the curtain discovers the five doctors, their host and Mrs. Dubedat sitting over coffee and cigarettes : Dubedat has just gone out to put on his coat, preparatory to an early start home. They have all been charmed with the young artist and his wife, except Sir Patrick, who has his suspicions. You cannot tell, he says, what a man is, until you know his behaviour with regard to money and women. Dubedat returns for a few minutes to fetch Jennifer, and they go off with Ridgeon's emphatic promise that he will undertake the cure. Alone together, the five men begin discussing the artist, and it comes out that he has tried to borrow money from three of them, successfully in two cases ; and they have hardly got over their dismay, when one of the maids comes in to ask for the address of the gentleman who has just gone away "with that woman": she turns out to be Dubedat's lawful wife. In addition to these damaging discoveries, poor Blenkinsop enters, terribly upset at having failed to catch Dubedat before he started, because he has borrowed his last half-crown. Before the evening is out he confesses, somewhat reluctantly, to his friends that his own lungs also are touched. Ridgeon decides, after talking over the matter, to save Blenkinsop, and Dubedat is handed over to the mercies of Sir Ralph Bloomfield Bonnington.

Act III. Sir Ralph, Sir Patrick, Cutler Walpole, and Ridgeon visit Dubedat's studio to confront him with his misdeeds and to explain to his wife that Sir Ralph will undertake the case instead. Dubedat meets their indignation with dumbfounding placidity. He has no conscience whatever about anything outside his work ; but as far as that is concerned he allows nothing to prevent him from doing his best. In this scene he actually tries to borrow money from Ridgeon, on the security of a post-dated cheque, which will enable Ridgeon to blackmail Jennifer into paying him more than he lends.

The last act, in which Dubedat dies in front of the footlights, has been the subject of a good deal of discussion. Mr. Granville Barker acted the death naturally and realistically. Fault was found with him on the ground that a death struggle untouched by artistic emotion is an unfair, unilluminating assault on the emotions. But it was necessary that we should realize that chilly, quiet, matter-of-factness of physical extinction, so terribly inconsistent with all we know death means, at the very moment of feeling pity for a man whose will is still ablaze, and whose mind is clear and detached in spite of the creeping languor of death. For Dubedat dies in a pose. He hoards his last strength and his last words to stamp an image of himself on his wife's heart which he knows is not the true one. Next to his immortality in his pictures, he values that reincarnation most. He keeps an interviewer in the room, in the hope that some faint reflection of himself, as he would wish to be remembered, may possibly be thrown also upon the great blank sheet of the public imagination. The cheerful and callous young ass of an interviewer conveys by a few words, after all is over, that he has taken away a grotesquely topsy-turvy idea, such as would have disgusted the dead man and made him laugh sourly enough. That is a telling piece of irony ; but profounder still is the irony of the success of Dubedat's pose upon his wife ; nothing can henceforth shake her conviction that he is a hero, a king of men. She turns to the doctors, who have let him die because they judged him unworthy, and appeals to them as though they were all standing together on the top of a mountain of transfiguration. In this last scene Dubedat obeyed the same instinct which drove him in life to create beautiful pictures. His last picture is painted on his wife's mind. This is the climax of the play; it is followed by an anticlimax which completes the story.

Ridgeon and Jennifer meet at an exhibition of Dubedat's pictures. She challenges him with being indirectly responsible for her husband's death. "Confess to a failure and save our friendship." He admits straight out that he killed Dubedat. But she does not understand at first what he means by this admission. It only gradually dawns on her that he left her husband to die on purpose, and that his motive was a desire to marry her himself, and to shield her from the discovery that her husband was an unmitigated rascal. She is amazed at the idea that he should have been in love with her all the time, and still more at his dreaming she could care for him in return. "You—an elderly man!" At this reply he staggers back and cries, "O Dubedat, thou art avenged!" A moment later he hears that, in obedience to her late husband's wish, she has married again, and the play ends with this last exclamation, "Then I have committed a completely disinterested murder."

This epilogue is disastrous. Firstly, it tends to trivialize the impression the play has made; for though the last line in it may be, in intention, a summing up of the irony of the story, it rings out fatally in the key of burlesque, like the previous exclamation. Secondly, Ridgeon does not do justice to his own motives; he did not decide against Dubedat entirely because he coveted his wife, or because he wished to save her from disillusionment; so this admission on his part confuses the audience's recollection of what has gone before.

Now to turn to the characters and the acting. Sir Ralph Bloomfield Bonnington (fashionable physician) is a masterpiece. A critic in search of emphasis may choose between saying that the part was worthy of Mr. Eric Lewis's acting, or that Mr. Eric Lewis's acting was worthy of the part; either statement implies absolute praise. Long will "B. B.," the frock-coated, rosy-gilled babbler of scientific jargon and impromptu consolations, hang in our imaginations! Mr. Lewis's optimistic, confident tenor voice and Micawber-like alacrity of gesture, his air of sympathetic concern, his soothing courtesy of assent as he hovered over his patient or listened to the anxieties of the wife, were perfect. He is at once typical and individual, and, therefore, not simply a caricature. Cutler Walpole (Mr. James Hearn) is a caricature of the brusque, hard-headed type of surgeon, whose manner seems to say, "Pooh, man! the body has no mysteries for us now. Trust me, I'll put that right in a jiffy." "B. B." inspires confidence and holds together a fashionable practice by blandishment and his own natural buoyancy, Cutler Walpole by bluff; both succeed completely in taking in themselves as well. Mr. Michael Sherbrooke as the little German Jew doctor, who had scraped together a nice little fortune by using the magic words "cure guaranteed," was complete, from the gleam of his spectacles to the rasp of his accent. The poor but honest Blenkinsop is almost too worthy an individual to engage real sympathy. After Dubedat has gone off with his last half-crown on the night of the dinner at Richmond, he actually refuses the loan of an Underground fare from Ridgeon, whom he has known for twenty years, for fear his friends should dread his borrowing money on other occasions. This is carrying rugged independence to the extent of becoming a social incubus, and one's sympathies begin to incline towards Dubedat. Mr. Gurney found a wonderfully expressive manner for Blenkinsop; a kind of deprecating, big-dog shyness which suggested a loyal, modest nature. Ridgeon was Mr. Webster's best part. In appearance he bore an odd resemblance to the Millais portrait of Ruskin. His slightly pompous, educated voice and his self-conscious gestures, both so habitually controlled that they can no longer betray emotion, only express it intentionally, and the suggestions of intellectual refinement in his manner, were all traits of an admirably acted, real character.

Miss McCarthy as Jennifer conveyed the romance of her part. She was admirable when pleading for her husband's life in the first act.

Dubedat was played by Mr. Barker as well as the drawing of the character allowed. He suggested perfectly the character of a rather agreeably uppish, slouching, loose young blackguard at the dinner; and he died well. But the psychology of the character is far too crude to be convincing. The incidents intended to show him up occur with an artificial appositeness, and Dubedat himself is mechanically constructed on the old unsatisfactory formula of "the artistic temperament," that dismal relic of the art for art's sake movement, so wretchedly barren itself in England.

The avoidance of all artificial appositeness, unreality, or improbability is absolutely essential to the impressiveness of a Shavian play, and the presence of such blemishes is particularly deadly to them for this reason : Mr. Shaw's aim as a dramatist is to correct our conception of the normal, which has been disturbed by a conventional treatment of human nature on the stage. His characters and situations consequently strike the playgoer at first as strange and fantastic ; it is with difficulty that he can believe them real ; they are so different from what he expected to see. If, therefore, the action and situations deviate in the slightest degree from probability, the whole play, characters and all, in which the ludicrous and astonishing are already so strangely mingled, takes on the air of a fantastic and arbitrary creation. Only the man whose matter-of-factness is above suspicion can convince us that something unexpected is true ; and Mr. Shaw deals almost entirely with the unexpected. The points at which he has deviated from matter-of-fact plausibility in this play are Dubedat's conduct in the studio and on the night of the dinner ; Jennifer's behaviour in the epilogue ; and the simultaneous morning visits, of the four doctors with leading practices, on two separate occasions, to the studio of an impoverished artist, where only one had professional business. " Now," says the spectator to himself, " the man who will bend facts like this, may well give human nature a twist: I believe this is a clever puppet-show." He is quite wrong, but the mistake is excusable.

THE PHILANDERER

This is a queer piece of work, and finds its place very properly among the "Unpleasant" plays. It was not very successful at the Court for the reason that to make the play intelligible, Charteris must be acted by some one who understands him perfectly, and such a person probably does not exist. Just as in the playing of Dubedat it is absolutely necessary that the actor should bring out something in his character, to explain why his victims never sent for the police (which Mr. Barker succeeded in doing), so the actor who takes the part of Charteris must make it clear why he is not periodically kicked. He was exasperating and he was disliked, but he was not that sort of person. This can only be conveyed through something in his manner and in his way of saying things. Mr. Webster in the part certainly did not appear like a man who gets kicked; but it was his own dignity and his own personality, not Charteris's, that were apparent.

Charteris is a very exceptional character. I hazard as an explanation of his immunity and his influence on others, not his wit or cleverness, but the impression he made of being a fantastically honest man; people instinctively felt that he had administered to himself so many moral kickings as to make any they could add an unnecessary impertinence. In one of his talks with the discarded Julia, he says, "I confess I am either something more or something less than a gentleman; you used to give me the benefit of the doubt." It is possible, however, to be both at the same time, and that is precisely what he was. Charteris's honesty in his philanderings was morally superior to the code of the conventional gentleman in such matters, which is to continue to simulate respect for the self-respect of the woman, when he knows it to be a sham in which she does not believe herself, in order that she may return the compliment; but on the other hand he fell far below the gentleman in the wanton cruelty with which he used his cleverness to hurt his victims without their being able to understand what he meant. He was not a coxcomb physically or morally, his vanity was superficial; but intellectually he was a cruel coxcomb. For instance, in one of his last interviews with Julia, he exclaims, "Oh, what I have learnt from you!—from you who could learn nothing from me! I made a fool of you, and you brought me wisdom; I broke your heart, and you brought me joy; I made you curse your womanhood, and you revealed my manhood to me. Blessings, for ever and ever, on my Julia's name!" (with genuine emotion, he takes her hand and kisses it). Julia, who does not understand, snatches away her hand, saying, "Oh, stop talking that nasty sneering stuff." Where Charteris behaves like a cad, is in not leaving her alone after he has disentangled himself, but in continuing to vivisect her when he knows she can learn nothing from these painful experiments. His general philandering he justified on the ground that it was always instructive to both parties ; here he had no such excuse.

Again, the match between Dr. Paramore and Julia, which is so much against her natural inclination, is engineered by Charteris to free himself from her persecutions ; and there is something so cruel in his using his cleverness and his knowledge of "the very pulse of the machine" to contrive it, that the spectator is disgusted.

The play, like all artistic work which has aimed in its day at being up-to-date, strikes us now as old-fashioned. It is a product of the early eighteen-nineties, when Ibsen first arrived as a moral prophet on our shores and people went about trying to "realize themselves ;" when the moral of The Doll's House was taken as the solution of marriage and sex difficulties ; when women were very conscious of being emancipated and determined to sink the "he and she" in all relations and to "belong to themselves ;" in fact of the period when The Heavenly Twins and The Woman Who Did, and similar books appeared.

Mr. Shaw sympathized with the woman's movement, as his Quintessence of Ibsenism remains to show ; but as a critical observer he saw clearly enough that many women who went in for emancipating themselves had not thrown off the "old" woman when they put on the "new." This play is a satire which exposes such women effectively enough. However, the "new woman" no longer exists, nor do such old-fashioned fathers as Cuthbertson and Craven who talk about "manly men and womanly women ;" so the satire directed against them does not seem now to hit a mark worth aiming at.

The kind of comedy extracted from the situations which expose the wretched Julia, is not the kind to make one laugh. A man in the clutches of a jealous termagant might chuckle with delight to see Julia stripped and whipped ; but, really, some kind of interested animus is necessary to appreciate this kind of fun ; though there are witty things throughout the dialogue which everybody can enjoy, such as this passage for instance.

CHARTERIS. I accuse you of stealing letters of mine.

JULIA (rising). Yes, nice letters !

CHARTERIS.—Of breaking your solemn promises not to do it again ; of spending hours—aye, days !—piecing together the contents of my waste-paper basket in your search for more letters. . . .

JULIA. I was justified in reading your letters. Our perfect confidence in one another gave me the right to do it.

Miss Wynne-Matthison played Grace Tranfield, who refuses to marry the Philanderer, with perfect accuracy. The most delightfully-acted character in the piece was Cuthbertson (Mr. Luigi Lablache).

MAJOR BARBARA

I have not considered Major Barbara in its chronological place, because it and Don Juan in Hell lead naturally to the remarks upon Mr. Shaw's philosophy, with which it will be well to end these criticisms of his plays. / Major Barbara is the story of a woman who lives in her religion and loses it ; who, after enduring the desolation of seeing her own and all the world's hope hang torn before her eyes, finds at last a belief her passionate heart can live by. This account will seem ridiculous to those who heard only the crackle of wit, the rhetoric of theory, and brisk interchange of comment ; yet it is the centre and significance of the play.

It is the first English play which has for its theme the struggle between two religions in one mind. And to have written upon that theme convincingly is a triumph, which criticism cannot appreciably lessen. The second act is "wonderful, most wonderful, and yet again wonderful, and after that past all whooping."

Barbara is the daughter of the chief partner in the biggest cannon-manufactory in the world. Her mother is a lady of birth and position, "well mannered yet appallingly outspoken and indifferent to the opinions of her interlocutors, arbitrary and high-tempered to the last bearable degree, full of class prejudices, conceiving the universe exactly as if it were a large house in Wilton Crescent, though handling her corner of it very effectively on that assumption." Barbara's parents have been living apart for years.

When the play begins, the engagement of Lady Britomart's two daughters to young men without money has compelled her to ask her husband to call upon her in order that she may persuade him to make a fitting provision for them. The one daughter is a very ordinary society girl ; the other, Barbara, has a genius for saving souls, and is already a prominent officer in the Salvation Army. She is engaged to Cusins, a professor of Greek, who fell in love with her and proposed under the impression that she was an ordinary Salvation Army lass.

The first act introduces these people, and its interest lies in the return of Undershaft to the bosom of his family. Lady Britomart was admirably played by Miss Filippi. On Undershaft's being announced I had a vivid recollection of her adjusting her spectacles and settling herself in a chair facing the door with an admirable air of nervous decision. Mr. Calvert's Undershaft was not nearly so good as his blustering Broadbent or his balmy "William"; for Undershaft was good-natured and easy-going on the surface but fuliginous and formidable underneath, but Mr. Calvert was complacent underneath and formidable on the surface. Of all Undershaft's family Barbara alone interests him, and his heart goes out to her, though he would resent such a description of his feelings. They both have religious natures, but the beliefs of each are poles asunder. Each wishes to convert the other, and they strike a bargain; he will visit her Salvation Army shelter, if she will afterwards visit his gun-manufactory. The second act is laid at the shelter.

There is no space in which to dilate upon the pathos, passion, and significant realism of this scene, or upon the ironic ecstasy which Cusins contributes to it (imagine the difficulty of acting such a purely intellectual passion!) but one incident must be noted. Bill Walker, a bullying sort of ruffian, slouches in to recover "his girl," who has been recently converted; and when one of the Salvation lasses tells him she has gone away, he hits her in the mouth. Now, this blow very nearly brings about his own conversion; for Jenny Hill does not resent it, and Major Barbara takes advantage of the shame which begins to stir in him to make him more and more uncomfortable. His impulse is to buy back his peace of mind and self-respect by getting thrashed by his girl's new Salvation Army "bloke," and failing in this, he offers Jenny a sovereign. Barbara tells him he cannot buy his salvation; she wants to touch his heart, and if he were to think he had made amends, he would go away as stupid and brutal as he came. Her father all the while watches this soul-saving process with grim sympathy. His chance comes when the news arrives that Bodger, the whisky-distiller, has offered a £5,000 subscription if another £5,000 can be raised. The money is of vital importance to the Army; indeed this shelter will have to be closed if funds are not forthcoming. Barbara has already refused £100 from her father for the same reason that she refused Bill's twenty shillings—because she wants her father to give up manufacturing the means of death; and if he can ease his conscience by being charitable, he will go on making money out of the sufferings of men. But the Army does not attach so much importance to the saving of Undershaft's soul, as to the power his money will give them to help many others; so when he offers to make up the other £5,000 they accept it with grateful thanksgivings and Hallelujahs. This is a terrible shock to Barbara, who realizes, for the first time, that the power of the Army rests ultimately on the support of its worst enemies, who make the money they give away out of the very misery and degradation which the Army fights. The other side to this view is put by Mrs. Baines: "Who would have thought that any good could have come out of war and drink? And yet their profits are brought to-day to the feet of salvation to do its blessed work." Barbara sees that Bodger "wants to send his cheque down to buy us and go on being as wicked as ever"; while Cusins exclaims with excited irony, "The millennium will be inaugurated by the unselfishness of Undershaft and Bodger. O be joyful!" The Army must accept the money, since they are powerless without it; but the fact that they are right to accept it, shows that they are fighting a battle they can never win; since if once they begin to make real headway against Bodger, his subscriptions, which are their means of victory, will be cut off. Barbara realizes this on reflection; but at the moment it is the revelation of the spring whence the Army's power is drawn, coupled with the object lesson that the Army cannot afford to think of the individual soul while such supplies are in question, which tumbles her faith to the ground. She is quite certain that a crusade which draws its strength from the evils it wishes to destroy, cannot put the world straight. This is a criticism which hits all the Churches and all Charitable Institutions in so far as they hope to do this. From a revolutionist's point of view, they are also objectionable, because they tend to keep the poor quiet, by making them less discontented with conditions which they ought to die rather than stand, and the rich from thinking they are just and honest, by offering them opportunities of being generous and kind; in short, because they keep those who should be indignant, servile, and those who ought to be uneasy, self-satisfied.

Undershaft's gospel, on its social side, is to preach socialism to the rich and rebellion to the poor, whereby he twists the same rope from both ends. The most important fact to insist upon is, therefore, the importance of money; tacitly, this is recognized by every one; the possession of comfortable independence being everywhere the most universally powerful motive. But instead of blinking this fact and preaching "Blessed are the poor," while taking care at the same time to have a reliable source of income ourselves, we must preach "Cursed be the poor," so that every poverty-stricken man may either feel he has a grievance not to be borne, or be ashamed of the feebleness which keeps him so. The way in which Undershaft puts it is that poverty is literally the worst of crimes, and it follows from this assertion that a man is right to commit any other crime to avoid that one, should circumstances force him into such a dilemma. Now this is a doctrine that good sense refuses to swallow. How then did Undershaft or Mr. Shaw come to believe it, and urge it with such vehemence?

The temperament and interests of a reformer drive him to look continually at results of actions and emotions in valuing them rather than at these things themselves; and since poverty and ill-health are probably the causes of more evil than is any single vice, the reformer slips more readily than other people into the mistake of thinking that these things are, in themselves, worse than any vice. But it is clear that what may be a cause of evil is often not even bad at all in itself, let alone not so bad as the evil; and equally, that the means to good are often valueless in themselves, compared to what they help to bring about. That poverty is not bad in itself—is no more a crime than is a broken leg—is so clear that if a man of Mr. Shaw's talents had not said it was, no critic would bore his reader with a refutation of such a statement. Bunyan and Blake, whom Mr. Shaw praises with such liberality of genuine admiration, were very poor; yet that they were among the most ignoble of criminals he himself would never admit.

It is clear that poverty, like ill-health, is only bad as a difficulty in the way of a fine life which a few surmount, and that therefore the pretext of escaping from it cannot justify the worst actions. Indeed, if Undershaft's doctrine were generally believed, the only effect would be to make poverty the cause of much more evil, of many more acts of violence, oppression and meanness, than it is now. Dubedat took every means in his power—blackmailing, stealing, utilizing his wife's charms as bait—to escape poverty; yet I do not think Undershaft would have felt that he was doing much to bring about a better state of things.

And Undershaft himself? He talks very big about having been prepared to kill anybody as long as he was poor; but what did he do? Did he found his fortunes by knocking an old woman on the head and stealing her watch, or by going into partnership with a Mrs. Warren? No, of course not; he stuck to his desk like a good young man, inched and pinched until he had made himself useful to the firm, and then took good care not to be put upon. Undershaft's weakness lay in talking big; that is really what his sensible wife could not stand. In Act II he tells his son that he and Lazarus are really the people who govern England, and decide questions of war and peace; and in Act III he explains to Cusins that he is a fool if he accepts the partnership in the the hope of power, since he and Lazarus are in fact absolutely powerless. In both cases he is talking big.

In this third and last act Barbara and her family visit the town of Perivale St. Andrews. They find it is a clean, fine place, where everybody is well-fed and well-clad. It is, in fact, a kind of socialistic community with this great difference ; instead of being pervaded with a spirit of equality and independence, the whole place is honey-combed with snobbishness and petty oppression. This spirit is what Barbara will spend her life now in fighting. Her work will be amongst uppish, vulgar, prosperous self-satisfied people, and her last speech is a pæan of rejoicing that she will in future never feel the humiliation of knowing that the truths she has at heart are listened to because she distributes alms at the same time.

The last act is weak on the stage ; indeed the defect of the play is that Barbara's conversion is much less impressive than the loss of her old religion. Miss Annie Russell, who was so good in the first two acts, could make little of the third.

The moral of the play filtered from Undershaft's plutocratic gospel would run as follows : that the ideal state is one in which no one is poor ; that the ideal man is he who shifts vigorously for himself ; that the best cure for the present anarchic and miserable state of things, is that every individual should become self-reliant and use the weapons which Undershaft manufactures against those who oppress him ; that those who have already some wealth and independence are the people it is most profitable to teach what is good ; that to the rest it is more important to preach rebellion. If Man and Superman is in a sense the cry of a reformer clinging to the idea of selective breeding of mankind as the last hen-coop in the wreck of his hopes, Major Barbara expresses the disappointed impatience of a pamphleteer who gives up his belief in persuasion and turns to the swifter agency of force. The fallacy which the play attacks with perfect justice, is that of preaching to or of helping the poor simply because they are poor.

The mistake into which Mr. Shaw slips of saying that poverty is a crime far worse than murder or lust or avarice, since it is perhaps a more constant cause of crime and feebleness than any one of these, is a fallacy which in one form or other often occurs in his writings. His great defect as an artist-philosopher is that he does not distinguish between those things which are bad as means and those which are bad in themselves, or between what is good as an end and what is only good as a means to that end; that when he judges the actions and emotions or the lives and characters of men and women, his test is invariably—What use are they? If he feels them to be useful as a means to reforming society, then they are good; if they cannot be shown to be useful, or only to be less useful than something else, then they are judged to be comparatively valueless. But it is certain that qualities and things which are valuable as means are not necessarily worth having for their own sakes, and that things very good in themselves may not at the same time be important as means to something else worth having. And since this is indubitably true, it follows that any one who judges the values of things from the point of view of their results, and hardly ever asks himself whether they have any value in themselves, must often get his scale of values wrong. This is the most general criticism which can be brought against the morality of the Shavian drama. A great part of that originality of view which underlies the plays is due to the fact that he judges goodness and badness by their results alone. The transvaluation which follows is often startling ; actions which nobody thought particularly bad are put in a class with the most heinous offences, and qualities not commonly allowed to be claims upon the respect of others are exalted above affection. In this he is often right, because the goodness of things as a means may be an important part of their total value ; but he is, also, often wrong, because the importance of anything as a means to something else may be a very small part of its total value. For instance, what are the qualities most extolled in his plays? Vitality, pugnacity, political and intellectual honesty, fearlessness and universal benevolence : these are clearly useful. What are the qualities and emotions which on the whole are depreciated or pointedly ignored? Personal affections, admiration, and sensitiveness to beauty : these cannot be shown to be such powerful means towards bringing about a better state of society ; but are they not essential elements in that better state itself? Mr. Shaw ignores the question of ultimate ends so completely that when he defines Heaven, the ideal state, he describes it as a community of men working towards bringing it into existence. "In Heaven you live and work, instead of playing and pretending, you face things as they are ; you escape nothing but glamour, and your steadfastness and your peril are your glory. . . . But even as you [the devil] enjoy the contemplation of such romantic mirages as beauty and pleasure, so would I enjoy the contemplation of that which interests me about all things : namely, Life : the force that ever strives to attain greater power of contemplating itself." The point which I wish to insist upon here is not that Mr. Shaw is not right in considering his Heaven superior to his Hell—it obviously is ; but that his Heaven is not the contemplation of what is perfect, but of something that is struggling to become so. It is a condition in which there is still peril, where you “face things as they are ;” in short, a “community of saints” which is really a community of reformers. Mr. Shaw describes them as filled with “a passion of the divine will ;” but this passion is a desire to make the world better, and not a contemplation of perfection : in so far as it is a contemplative ecstasy at all, it is only rapture at the idea that perfection is possible. What chills us, then, in his Heaven is the misgiving that the phrase “masters of reality” (so the heavenly inhabitants are described) is a euphemism for a society of people all devoted to making each other and everybody else more virtuous. Now we can imagine something better than that ; and Mr. Shaw’s Hell, if he had not been so grossly unfair to it, seems to offer a better foundation for its construction. Hell is a community in which personal relations and the contemplation of beauty are the supreme goods. Mr. Shaw cheapens this ideal by assuming that the only kind of love which can compete with the fellow-service of heaven is a kind which might be worthily sung by Sedley, or set to music by Offenbach, or depicted by Fragonard. No one requires to be told that Mohammed’s paradise, however intellectualized and refined, is not the highest good ; but what is instructive in Mr. Shaw’s anti-thesis is that he sets so much store by the contemplation of what is both real and beautiful at the same time, raising this above the contemplation of beauty or goodness which is not accompanied by a true belief in the object. That this judgment is a true one nobody can doubt ; what can be protested against with equal justice is the assumption that love between individuals always implies contemplation of goodness and beauty which cannot be believed to be real.

The performance of Don Juan in Hell could only have been very interesting to those who enjoy an abstract discussion ; but as a spectacle it must have delighted all. The dresses, designed by Mr. Charles Ricketts, were most beautiful ; Mr. Robert Loraine's performance was a triumph of memory, if not of elocution. Mr. Michael Sherbrooke, as the Statue, declared his sentiments in an admirably military voice. Miss McCarthy was particularly good as the old woman, and radiant in her transformation.

The analysis of these eleven plays has not been elaborate enough to require a summary ; but there are a few points which may be added in conclusion.

As a dramatist Mr. Shaw's gift for caricature is a perpetual temptation to him, leading him often to destroy the atmosphere of reality which is so important to his plays. Though his caricatures are good in themselves, he has not always sufficient artistic self-control to keep them in their places. Moreover, that emotional asceticism, which has been already commented upon, is always tempting him to create in the spectator the balance of mind and emotion he respects by alternately touching him and making him laugh. This method succeeds when the scene, rousing a mixed emotion of sympathy and contempt, is a crude one, such as Broadbent's courting and comforting of Nora Reilly in John Bull's Other Island. But frequently this cannot be done by a series of consequent shocks ; for the emotion which ought to be roused by Mr. Shaw's situations is often too complex and delicate to be produced by such galvanic methods. Sir Ralph's harangue after the death of Dubedat is an instance of its failure.

One character in The Doctor's Dilemma remarks, "Life does not cease to be funny when people die any more than it ceases to be serious when people laugh," which would be a good motto for most of Mr. Shaw's plays. But what he constantly overlooks, as an artist, is that for a man who is feeling its tragedy, life does for the time cease to be comic. He relies, then, as an artist, too much on an exceptional flexibility of emotion in his audience. His weakness as a philosopher is to judge the value of human beings and emotions too exclusively by their usefulness towards furthering another end ; as a propagandist, to under-rate the intelligence of the average man.

His merits—if my criticisms have not suggested that these are remarkable, I have utterly failed. He has drawn more characters which are immediately recognized and understood than any other English dramatist with the exception of Shakespeare ; he has chosen for his subjects situations which are really interesting ; and he has made us laugh and think at the same time.

Every author of any power has a peculiar contagion. The contagion that we catch from Mr. Shaw's plays is an admiration for courage and intellectual honesty, and for a kind of spontaneity of character which is a blending of both. His plays attack hypocrisy by showing that men have more reason to be ashamed of the disguises of their egotism, than of their egotism itself. The influence of his writings tends to make them found their self-respect rather on their indubitable qualities than on their aspirations, and to prevent them looking for more in life and human nature than they are likely to find. The intention of the greater part of his work is to provide an antidote to romantic despair by forestalling disillusionment, and to stimulate an active and gay resolution in the place of an exasperated seclusion of spirit or indifference, either gloomy or light. Its danger for some is to breed in them such pride of courage in facing the triviality and ugliness of life, that they come to hate an ideal which may be better than reality, simply because it is not a fact. Mr. Shaw often warns us against calling his golden grapes of riches sour, but he has not warned us against disparaging celestial fruits, because they are out of our reach. —He has still to write his Wild Duck, which I take it will be a satire on "The Shavians," who derive a perverted gratification from the flatness of life and from the stupendous extent of the social improvements necessary, on account of the scope these offer for the exercise of a light-hearted courage in "facing facts" and for triumphing over more sensitive natures. All his work is marked by a straightforward dexterity of execution, which is in itself an æsthetic merit; and almost every play he has written stimulates that social consciousness of communal responsibility upon which the hopes of reformers depend.

CONCLUSION

At the close of such a commentary as this, in which many plays and many actors have been reviewed, it is natural to wonder somewhat anxiously what general impression may have been left behind; to what extent exceptional observations may have seemed to detract unduly from achievement, or how heavily expressions of admiration, owing to a general depreciation in the currency of praise, may have been discounted in the reader's mind. In consequence of such misgivings critics are apt in their conclusions to relax the stringency of their standards, and to fall into a strain of almost obituary benevolence. When the subject of the criticism is some author who has said his best, or some movement which has done its work, such leniency is fitting enough; but here, in the case of this enterprise, which has just finished the first period of its career in triumph, and is starting on the next with public gratitude and enthusiasm behind it, such a tone would be absurdly inappropriate. It requires no coddling at the hands of critics. I have not the least fear that, among those who saw many of these plays, the record of any blemishes will impair the favourable impressions they received; but in the case of those who saw none or only a few, it is necessary to guard against possible misunderstanding, should they ever read these pages.

It is common to complain of the censoriousness of gossip, and to attribute the severity of such comments as pass behind people's backs to ill-nature, when they were really due to the fact that the most interesting truths about a particular person happened to be concerned with his faults. In the same way, and for the same reason, the critic finds himself dwelling upon defects; they may be even the defects of good qualities—a needle cannot be sharp at both ends—but if they are more interesting than the merits themselves he is bound to give them close attention. Moreover, from those who give much, much is expected. The reason why criticism is so liable to get out of proportion is that the presence of some real merit is necessary to rouse the critical faculty at all, with the result that such works as possess it do not get praised in the same whole-hearted fashion as those which cannot provoke comparison with high achievement.

The work of the Vedrenne-Barker management has been remarkable enough to challenge the highest standards, and therefore to sharpen the eyes of critics. Certainly (if I may speak for myself) I should not have felt so keenly when anything was lacking in their performances had they not shown me at the same time to what pitch of excellence it is possible to attain.

APPENDIX

APPENDIX

THE following pages contain exact reprints of all programmes of the "Vedrenne-Barker" management,¹ except in half-a-dozen instances when plays were revived with casts identical or almost identical with those of previous runs; such revivals and alterations are noted at the foot of the earlier programmes. The programmes are arranged in chronological order according to the date of the first performance of each run.

"The Vedrenne-Barker Performances," strictly speaking, began on October 18, 1904, and lasted at the Court Theatre until June 29, 1907. During that time 32 plays by 17 authors were produced, and 946 performances were given; but, since one triple-bill and four double-bills were included, the total number of performances of separate plays amounts to 988, distributed amongst authors as follows :—

Shaw (11 plays) . . . 701	Hauptmann 9
Housman and Barker . . 48	Schnitzler 9
Euripides (3 plays) . . 48	Yeats 9
Barker 34	C. Harcourt 8
Galsworthy 29	Masefield 8
Hankin (2 plays) . . . 27	Maeterlinck 6
Robins 23	R. V. Harcourt . . . 2
Ibsen (2 plays) . . . 13	Fenn 2
Hewlett (2 plays) . . . 12
	988

¹ The first programme, of six matinées of Candida in April and May, 1904, is included as showing the beginning of these performances; but they are not regarded as belonging strictly to the "Vedrenne-Barker" series, and are not counted in the ensuing table, nor in the above figures.

PLAY.	AUTHOR.	PERFORMANCES.	PROGRAMMES ON PAGE
Man and Superman . . .	Bernard Shaw	176	138, 143, 158, 168
You Never Can Tell . . .	" "	149	136, -9, 154, 162
John Bull's Other Island . . .	" "	121	127, 131, -5, 140, 155
Capt. Brassbound's Conversion .	" "	89	151
Major Barbara	" "	52	145, 146
The Doctor's Dilemma . . .	" "	50	159
Prunella	Housman and Barker	48	130, 153, 167
The Voysey Inheritance . . .	Granville Barker	34	144, 149
Candida	Bernard Shaw	31	125, -9, 137
The Silver Box	J. Galsworthy	29	156, 164
Votes for Women	Elizabeth Robins	23	165
The Electra	Euripides	20	147
The Hippolytus	"	20	126, 152
The Return of the Prodigal .	St. John Hankin	19	141, 166
The Thieves' Comedy . . .	G. Hauptmann	9	133
The Pot of Broth	W. B. Yeats	9	} 132 (triple bill)
In the Hospital	A. Schnitzler	9
How he Lied to her Husband .	Bernard Shaw	9	} 134
The Trojan Women	Euripides	8
The Charity that began at Home	St. John Hankin	8	157
The Reformer	Cyril Harcourt	8	} 160 (double bill)
The Campden Wonder . . .	John Masefield	8
The Philanderer	Bernard Shaw	8	161
Don Juan in Hell	" "	8	} 169 (double bill)
The Man of Destiny	" "	8
Hedda Gabler	Henrik Ibsen	7	163
Aglavaine and Selysette . .	M. Maeterlinck	6	128
The Wild Duck	Henrik Ibsen	6	142
Pan and the Young Shepherd .	Maurice Hewlett	6	} 150 (double bill)
The Youngest of the Angels .	" "	6
A Question of Age	R. V. Harcourt	2	} 148 (double bill)
The Convict on the Hearth .	F. Fenn	2
		988

1904.

April 26th, 29th, May 3rd, 5th, 6th, and 10th.

CANDIDA

By Bernard Shaw.

Candida	Miss KATE RORKE
Proserpine Garnett	Miss SYDNEY FAIR- BROTHER
The Rev. James Mavor Morell				Mr. NORMAN McKINNEL
Eugene Marchbanks	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Mr. Burgess	Mr. A. G. POULTON
The Rev. Alexander Mill	Mr. ATHOL STEWART

The Action takes place at St. Dominic's Vicarage, Victoria
Park, E.

An October Day, 1894.

ACT I. Morning. ACT II. Afternoon. ACT III. Evening.

NOTE.—These performances are not counted in the enumeration of the Vedrenne-Barker series.

1904.

On October 18th, 20th, 21st, 25th, 27th and 28th, at 3 p.m.,

THE HIPPOLYTUS OF EURIPIDES

Translated by Gilbert Murray.

The Goddess Aphrodite	...	Miss ELINOR FOSTER
The Goddess Artemis	...	Miss GWENDOLEN BISHOP
Theseus (King of Athens and Trozên)	Mr. ALFRED BRYDONE
Phaedra (Daughter of Minos, King of Crete, Wife of Theseus)		Miss EDYTH OLIVE
Hippolytus (Bastard son of Theseus and the Amazon Hippolytê)	Mr. BEN WEBSTER
Henchman	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
An Old Huntsman	Mr. A. E. GEORGE
The Nurse	Miss ROSINA FILIPPI
Leader of Chorus	Miss TITA BRAND

Chorus of Trozenean Women:

Miss FLORENCE FARR, Miss DOROTHY THOMAS,
Miss AMY LAMBORN, Miss MAY MARTYN,
Miss MAUD YATES, Miss INTHEA PITZ,
Miss INESCOURT, Miss FLORENCE STONE,
Miss DEROS, Miss SANDBERG,
Miss GERTRUDE AYLWARD, Miss WEIGALL.

1904.

On November 1st, 3rd, 4th, 8th, 10th, and 11th, 1904, at 2.30 p.m.,

JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND

A New and Unpublished Play by Bernard Shaw.

Broadbent	Mr. LOUIS CALVERT
Larry Doyle	Mr. J. L. SHINE
Tim Haffigan	Mr. PERCIVAL STEVENS
Hodson	Mr. NIGEL PLAYFAIR
Keegan	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Patsy Farrell	Mr. GRAHAM BROWNE
Father Dempsey	Mr. CHARLES DALY
Corney Doyle	Mr. F. CREMLIN
Barney Doran	Mr. WILFRED SHINE
Matthew Haffigan	Mr. A. E. GEORGE
Aunt Judy	Miss AGNES THOMAS
Nora	Miss ELLEN O'MALLEY

ACT I.	...	Office of Broadbent & Doyle, Civil Engineers, Great George Street, West- minster.
ACT II.—Scene I.		Rosscullen Hill.
	Scene II.	The Round Tower.
ACT III.	...	The Grass Plot before Corney Doyle's House.
ACT IV.—Scene I.		The Parlour at Corney Doyle's.
	Scene II.	Rosscullen Hill.

1904.

On November 15th, 17th, 18th, 22nd, 24th and 25th, at 2.30 p.m.

AGLAVINE AND SELYSETTE

By Maeterlinck, and translated by Alfred Sutro.

Aglavaine	Miss EDYTH OLIVE
Selysette	Miss THYRZA NORMAN
Yssaline	Miss MARION PLARR
Meligraïne	Miss FLORENCE FARR
Meleander	Mr. WALTER HAMPDEN

The Incidental Music composed by Mr. DONALD TOVEY.
Orchestra under the direction of Mr. THEODORE STIER.

1904.

On November 29th, December 1st, 2nd, 6th,
8th, and 9th, at 3.

Extra Performances : Nov. 26th, at 3 and 8.30,
Dec. 10th, at 3 and 8.30.

CANDIDA

By Bernard Shaw.

Candida	Miss KATE RORKE
Prosperine Garnett	Miss SYDNEY FAIR- BROTHER
The Rev. James Mavor Morell				Mr. C. V. FRANCE
Eugene Marchbanks	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Mr. Burgess	Mr. EDWARD SASS
The Rev. Alexander Mill	Mr. ATHOL STEWART

The Action takes place at St. Dominic's Vicarage, Victoria
Park, E.

An October Day, 1894.

ACT I. Morning. ACT II. Afternoon. ACT III. Evening.

1905.

On May 23rd, 25th, 26th, 30th ; June 1st, 2nd, 6th, 8th, 9th, 13th, 15th, 16th, at 2.30.

MAN AND SUPERMAN

By Bernard Shaw.

Roebuck Ramsden	Mr. CHARLES GOODHART
Octavius Robinson	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
John Tanner	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Henry Straker...	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Hector Malone	Mr. HUBERT HARBEN
Mr. Malone	Mr. J. D. BEVERIDGE
Ann Whitefield	Miss LILLAH MCCARTHY
Mrs. Whitefield	Miss FLORENCE HAYDON
Miss Ramsden	Miss AGNES THOMAS
Violet Robinson	Miss SARAH BROOKE
Parlour Maid	Miss HAZEL THOMPSON

ACT I. Portland Place. Roebuck Ramsden's Study.

ACT II. Richmond. The Avenue to Mrs. Whitefield's House.

ACT III. At Granada. The Villa Garden.

Period.—The Present Time.

1905.

For Three Weeks only.

Commencing on Monday, June 12th, 1905.

Every Evening at 8.15,

And Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

YOU NEVER CAN TELL

By Bernard Shaw.

Mrs. Clandon	Mrs. THEODORE WRIGHT
Gloria Clandon	Miss TITA BRAND
Dolly Clandon	Miss SYDNEY FAIR BROTHER
Philip Clandon	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Fergus Crampton	Mr. J. D. BEVERIDGE
Finch McComas	Mr. J. H. BARNES
Valentine	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Bohun	Mr. NIGEL PLAYFAIR
The Waiter	Mr. LOUIS CALVERT
A Parlour Maid	Miss HAZEL THOMPSON

ACT I. A Dentist's Operating Room—Morning.

ACT II. The Marine Hotel—Luncheon.

ACT III. Sitting Room in the Hotel—Afternoon Tea.

ACT IV. Sitting Room in the Hotel—After Dinner.

Scene.—At the Seaside.

Time.—The Present.

1905.

Commencing on Monday, September 11th, 1905.

Every Evening at 8.15,

And Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND

By Bernard Shaw.

Broadbent	Mr. LOUIS CALVERT
Larry Doyle	Mr. DANIEL McCARTHY
Tim Haffigan	Mr. EDMUND LEA
Hodson	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Keegan	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Patsy Farrell	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Father Dempsey	Mr. J. H. BARNES
Corney Doyle	Mr. F. CREMLIN
Barney Doran	Mr. WILFRED SHINE
Matthew Haffigan	Mr. A. E. GEORGE
Aunt Judy	Miss AGNES THOMAS
Nora	Miss LILLAH McCARTHY

ACT I. ... Office of Broadbent & Doyle, Civil Engineers, Great George Street, Westminster.

ACT II.—Scene I. Rosscullen Hill.

Scene II. The Round Tower.

ACT III. ... The Grass Plot before Corney Doyle's
House.

ACT IV.—Scene I. The Parlour at Corney Doyle's.

Scene II. Rosscullen Hill.

1905.

On September 26th, 29th ; October 3rd, 6th, 10th, 13th, at 2.30.

THE RETURN OF THE PRODIGAL

A Comedy, in Four Acts, by St. John Hankin.

Samuel Jackson	Mr. J. H. BARNES
Mrs. Jackson	Miss FLORENCE HAYDON
Henry Jackson	Mr. DENNIS EADIE
Eustace Jackson	Mr. A. E. MATTHEWS
Violet Jackson	Miss AMY LAMBORN
Sir John Faringford, Bart.	Mr. ARTHUR APPLIN
Lady Faringford	Miss HILDA RIVERS
Stella Faringford	Miss HAZEL THOMPSON
Doctor Glaisher	Mr. F. W. PERMAIN
The Rev. Cyril Pratt	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Mrs. Pratt	Miss AGNES THOMAS
Baines	Mr. EDMUND GWENN

The Action of the Play takes place at Chedleigh Court.

ACT I. The Drawing Room.

ACT II. The Breakfast Room.

ACT III. (Ten days have elapsed since Act II.) The Lawn.

ACT IV. The Drawing Room.

1905.

On October 17th, 20th, 24th, 27th, 31st, and November 3rd, at 2.30.

THE WILD DUCK

A Play, in Five Acts, by Henrik Ibsen.

Werle	Mr. OSCAR ADYE
Gregers Werle...	Mr. SCOTT BUIST
Ekdal	Mr. A. E. GEORGE
Hjalmar Ekdal	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER *
Gina Ekdal	Miss AGNES THOMAS
Hedvig... ..	Miss DOROTHY MINTO
Mrs. Sorby	Miss ADA FERRAR
Relling... ..	Mr. MATHESON LANG
Molvik	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Graberg	Mr. FREDERICK LLOYD
Pattersen	Mr. C. L. DELPH
Jensen	Mr. R. F. KNOX
Another Waiter	Mr. L. HAMER
Kasperen	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Flor	Mr. KENELM F. FOSS
Balle	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Another Gentleman	Mr. LEWIS CASSON

Act I. Werle's Study.

Acts II., III., IV., and V. Hjalmar Ekdal's Studio.

* The part was played on Oct. 27th, 31st, and Nov. 3rd by Mr. Trevor Lowe.

1905.

Commencing on Monday, October 23rd, 1905.

Every Evening at 8.15,

And Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

MAN AND SUPERMAN

By Bernard Shaw.

Roebuck Ramsden	Mr. J. H. BARNES
Octavius Robinson	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
John Tanner	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Henry Straker...	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Hector Malone	Mr. JAMES CAREW
Mr. Malone	Mr. F. CREMLIN
Ann Whitefield	Miss LILLAH MCCARTHY
Mrs. Whitefield	Miss FLORENCE HAYDON
Miss Ramsden	Miss AGNES THOMAS
Violet Robinson	Miss SARAH BROOKE
Parlour Maid	Miss HAZEL THOMPSON

ACT I. Portland Place. Roebuck Ramsden's Study.

ACT II. Richmond. The Avenue to Mrs. Whitefield's House.

ACT III. At Granada. The Villa Garden.

Period.—The Present Time.

1905.

On November 7th, 10th, 14th, 17th, 21st, and 24th, at 2.30.

THE VOYSEY INHERITANCE

A Play, in Five Acts, by Granville Barker.

Mr. Voysey	Mr. A. E. GEORGE
Mrs. Voysey	Miss FLORENCE HAYDON
Trenchard Voysey, K.C. ...	Mr. EUGENE MAYEUR
Honor Voysey	Miss GERALDINE OLLIFFE
Major Booth Voysey... ..	Mr. CHARLES FULTON
Mrs. Booth Voysey (Emily)...	Miss GRACE EDWIN
Christopher	HARRY C. DUFF
Edward Voysey	Mr. THALBERG CORBETT
Hugh Voysey	Mr. DENNIS EADIE
Mrs. Hugh Voysey (Beatrice)	Miss HENRIETTA WATSON
Ethel Voysey	Miss ALEXANDRA CARLISLE
Denis Tregoning	Mr. FREDERICK LLOYD
Alice Maitland	Miss MABEL HACKNEY
Mr. Booth	Mr. O. B. CLARENCE
The Rev. Evan Colpus ...	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Peacey	Mr. TREVOR LOWE
Phoebe	Miss GWYNNETH GALTON
Mary	Mrs. FORDYCE

Acts I. and IV. At the Office of Voysey & Son, in Lincoln's Inn.

Acts II., III., and V. At Bramleyfield, Chislehurst.

1905.

On November 28th, December 1st, 5th, 8th,
12th, and 15th, at 2.30.

MAJOR BARBARA

A Discussion, in Three Acts, by Bernard Shaw.

Lady Britomart Undershaft ...	Miss ROSINA FILIPPI
Stephen Undershaft	Mr. HUBERT HARBEN
Morrison	Mr. C. L. DELPH
Barbara Undershaft	Miss ANNIE RUSSELL
Sarah Undershaft	Miss HAZEL THOMPSON
Charles Lomax	Mr. DAWSON MILWARD
Adolphus Cusins	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Andrew Undershaft	Mr. LOUIS CALVERT
Rummy Mitchens	Miss CLARE GREET
Snobby Price	Mr. ARTHUR LACEBY
Jenny Hill	Miss DOROTHY MINTO
Peter Shirley	Mr. F. CREMLIN
Bill Walker	Mr. OSWALD YORKE
Mrs. Baines	Miss E. WYNNE-MATTHISON
Bilton	Mr. EDMUND GWENN

The characters are put in the order in which they come on the stage.

Time.—Three successive days in January, 1906.

Place.—London.

- ACT I. The Library in Lady Britomart Undershaft's House in Wilton Crescent.
- ACT II. The West Ham Shelter of the Salvation Army.
- ACT III. Scene I. The Library in Wilton Crescent.
Scene II. Among the high explosive Sheds at the Arsenal of Messrs. Undershaft & Lazarus, near the model town of Perivale St. Andrews.

1906.

For Six Weeks only.

Commencing on Monday, January 1st, 1906.

Every Evening at 8.15,

And Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

MAJOR BARBARA

A Discussion, in Three Acts, by Bernard Shaw.

Lady Britomart Undershaft ...	Miss MADGE McINTOSH
Stephen Undershaft	Mr. HUBERT HARBEN
Morrison	Mr. C. L. DELPH
Sarah Undershaft	Miss HAZEL THOMPSON
Barbara Undershaft	Miss ANNIE RUSSELL
Charles Lomax	Mr. F. LUMSDEN HARE
Adolphus Cusins	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
Andrew Undershaft	Mr. LOUIS CALVERT
Rummy Mitchens	Miss CLARE GREET
Snobby Price	Mr. ARTHUR LACEBY
Jenny Hill	Miss DOROTHY MINTO
Peter Shirley	Mr. F. CREMLIN
Bill Walker	Mr. OSWALD YORKE
Mrs. Baines	Miss E. WYNNE-MATTHISON
Bilton	Mr. EDMUND GWENN

The characters are put in the order in which they come on the stage.

Time.—Three successive days in January, 1906.

Place.—London.

ACT I. The Library in Lady Britomart Undershaft's House in Wilton Crescent.

ACT II. The West Ham Shelter of the Salvation Army.

ACT III. Scene I. The Library in Wilton Crescent.

Scene II. Among the high explosive Sheds at the Arsenal of Messrs. Undershaft & Lazarus, near the model town of Perivale St. Andrews.

NOTE.—Substituted with almost the same cast on February 13th, 16th, 20th, and 23rd, 1906, for A Question of Age and The Convict on the Hearth.

1906.

On January 16th, 19th, 23rd, 26th, 30th, and February 2nd, at 2.30.

THE ELECTRA OF EURIPIDES

Translated by Gilbert Murray.

The Scene is laid before a Peasant's Hut in the Mountains of Argos.

The Play was first acted in the year 413 B.C.

Electra (Daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra) ...	Miss E. WYNNE-MATTHISON
Clytemnestra (Queen of Argos, widow of Agamemnon) ...	Miss EDYTH OLIVE
Orestes (Son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra ; now in banishment)	Mr. E. HARCOURT WILLIAMS
A Peasant (Husband of Electra)	Mr. STRATTON RODNEY
An Old Man (Formerly servant to Agamemnon)	Mr. J. H. BARNES
A Messenger	Mr. HUBERT HARBEN
Pylades (Son of Strophios, King of Phocis ; friend to Orestes)	Mr. FREDERICK LLOYD
Castor (The demi-god, worshipped together with his twin brother Polydeuces)	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
Leader of Chorus	Miss GERTRUDE SCOTT

Chorus :

Miss GWENDOLEN BISHOP, Miss AMY LAMBORN,
Miss VERA LONGDEN, Miss VIOLET MYERS,
Miss M. SAUMAREZ, Miss ELAINE SLEDDALL,
Miss HAZEL THOMPSON, Miss PENELOPE WHEELER.

Music by Theodore Stier.

NOTE.—Revived March 12th, 1906, for two weeks only, with the above cast, except that Orestes was played by Mr. Henry Ainley.

1906.

On February 6th, 9th, [13th, 16th, 20th, and 23rd,]*
at 2.30.

A QUESTION OF AGE

A Comedy, in Three Acts, by Robert Vernon Harcourt.

Lt.-Col. Mark Langley, C.B.	Mr. FREDERICK KERR
Henry Bernard	Mr. C. M. HALLARD
Hon. Bertie Graham	Mr. KENNETH DOUGLAS
Baron von Berolstein	Mr. STRATTON RODNEY
Mr. Ferguson	Mr. FREDERIC TOPHAM
Johnson	Mr. C. L. DELPH
Footman	Mr. FREDERICK LLOYD
Mrs. Beddoes	Miss FANNY BROUGH
Olive Vane	Miss MABEL HACKNEY
Countess of Clare	Miss AGNES KNIGHTS
Lady Elsie Ireland	Miss IRENE FITZGERALD
Baroness von Berolstein	Miss DARRAGH
Shopwoman	Miss M. DANIELL
A Customer	Mrs. CHARLES MALTBY

ACT I. Madame Lizette's Hat Shop, Dover Street.

ACT II. The Hall at Lord Clare's, Steynham Court.

ACT III. Joint Rooms of Bernard & Graham, Park Place, St. James.

To be followed by

THE CONVICT ON THE HEARTH

By Frederick Fenn.

George Midden	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Thomas Midden	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Mrs. Midden	Miss MARY BROUGH
Jenny Midden	Miss EILY MALYON
Maud Midden	MERRIE OMAR
Percy Kitchener Midden	SIDNEY GRATA
Joseph Peterson	Mr. STRATTON RODNEY
Amy Watersmith	Miss CLARE GREET
Jim Watersmith	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Miss Harcourt	Miss MADGE McINTOSH
Rev. Cartwright Dade	Mr. C. V. FRANCE

SCENE.—A Room in Corporation Buildings, Kennington Butts.

* Major Barbara was substituted for these four performances.

1906.

For Four Weeks only.

Commencing Monday, February 12th, 1906.

Every Evening at 8.15.

Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

THE VOYSEY INHERITANCE

A Play, in Five Acts, by Granville Barker.

Mr. Voysey	Mr. FREDERICK KERR
Mrs. Voysey	Miss FLORENCE HAYDON
Trenchard Voysey, K.C. ...	Mr. EUGENE MAYEUR
Honor Voysey	Miss EDYTH OLIVE
Major Booth Voysey	Mr. CHARLES FULTON
Mrs. Booth Voysey (Emily) ...	Miss AMY LAMBORN
Christopher	CECIL DOYLE
Edward Voysey	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Hugh Voysey	Mr. HUBERT HARBEN
Mrs. Hugh Voysey (Beatrice)...	Miss MADGE McINTOSH
Ethel Voysey	Miss HAZEL THOMPSON
Denis Tregoning	Mr. FREDERICK LLOYD
Alice Maitland... ..	Miss MABEL HACKNEY
Mr. Booth	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
The Rev. Evan Colpus	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Peacey	Mr. TREVOR LOWE
Phœbe	Miss GWYNNETH GALTON
Mary	Mrs. CHARLES MALTBY

ACTS I. and IV. At the Office of Voysey & Son, in Lincoln's Inn.

ACTS II., III., and V. At Bramfield, Chislehurst.

1906.

On Feb. 27th, Mar. 2nd, 6th, 9th, 13th, and 16th.

PAN AND THE YOUNG SHEPHERD

A Pastoral Play, in Two Acts, by Maurice Hewlett.
The Music by H. W. Hewlett.

Geron	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Neanias	Mr. HENRY AINLEY
Balkis	Miss RAY ROCKMAN
Teucer	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Mopsus	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Sphorx	Mr. STRATTON RODNEY
Merla	Miss SUZANNE SHELDON
Aglaë	Miss GRACE LANE
Erotion...	Miss LILLAH MCCARTHY
Sitys	Miss GWENDOLEN BISHOP
Geërna	Miss HAZEL THOMPSON
Phoenos...	Miss GWLADYS WYNNE
Dryas	Miss MABEL HACKNEY
Adora	Miss ALICE CRAWFORD
Pan	Mr. NORMAN MCKINNEL

To be followed by

THE YOUNGEST OF THE ANGELS

By Maurice Hewlett.

Adapted by the Author from one of his Novels.

Dr. Dolfino Tron	Mr. J. H. BARNES
Mr. Francis Hastings...	Mr. E. HARCOURT WILLIAMS
Donna Domenica	Miss LILLAH MCCARTHY
Nonna	Miss AGNES THOMAS

1906.

On March 20th, 23rd, 27th, 30th ; April 3rd and 6th, at 2.30.

CAPTAIN BRASSBOUND'S CONVERSION

By Bernard Shaw.

Lady Cecily Waynflete	...	Miss ELLEN TERRY
Sir Howard Hallam	...	Mr. J. H. BARNES
Captain Brassbound	...	Mr. FREDERICK KERR
Rankin...	...	Mr. F. CREMLIN
Drinkwater	...	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Redbrook	...	Mr. C. L. DELPH
Johnson	...	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Marzo	...	Mr. MICHAEL SHER- BROOKE
Sidi el Assif	...	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
The Cadi	...	Mr. TREVOR LOWE
Osman	...	Mr. GORDON BAILEY
Hassan	...	Mr. JULES SHAW
Capt. Hamlin Kearney, U.S.N.	...	Mr. JAMES CAREW
American Bluejacket	...	Mr. FREDERICK LLOYD

ACT I. Mogador. The Missionary's Garden.

ACT II. Moskala. In a Castle on the Hills.

ACT III. Mogador. In the Missionary's House.

NOTE.—Revived for twelve weeks on April 16th, 1906, with the above cast, and the additional character of Muley, played by Mr. Cecil Steel. The theatre was closed for one night, the day before Miss Ellen Terry's jubilee.

1906.

For Two Weeks only.

Commencing Monday, March 26th, 1906.

Every Evening at 8.30.

Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

THE HIPPOLYTUS OF EURIPIDES

Translated by Gilbert Murray.

"The Play was first Acted when Epameinon was Archon, Olympiad 87, year 4 (429 B.C.). Euripides was first, Iophon second, Ion third."

The Goddess Aphrodite	...	Miss MADGE McINTOSH
The Goddess Artemis	...	Miss GWENDOLEN BISHOP
Theseus	Mr. WILLIAM HAVILAND
Hippolytus	Mr. HENRY AINLEY
Henchman	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
An Old Huntsman	Mr. STRATTON RODNEY
Phædra...	Miss EDYTH OLIVE
The Nurse	Miss FLORENCE FARR
Leader of Chorus	Miss GERTRUDE SCOTT

Chorus of Trozenean Women.

Miss AMY LAMBORN, Miss VERA LONGDEN,
Miss VIOLET MYERS, Miss M. SAUMAREZ,
Miss ELAINE SLEDDALL, Miss HAZEL THOMPSON,
Miss PENELOPE WHEELER, Miss GWLADYS WYNNE.

SCENE.—Before Theseus' Castle in Trozen.

Music by FLORENCE FARR.

1906.

April 24th, 27th; May 1st, 4th, 8th, 11th, 15th, 18th, 22nd, 25th, 29th, and June 1st, 1906, at 2.30.

PRUNELLA

Or, Love in a Dutch Garden

A Pierrot Play, in Three Acts,

By Laurence Housman and Granville Barker.

The Music by Joseph Moorat.

Pierrot	Mr. W. GRAHAM BROWNE
Scaramel	Mr. NIGEL PLAYFAIR
Kennel	Mr. TREVOR LOWE
Callow	Mr. GORDON BAILEY
Mouth	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Hawk	Mr. C. H. CROKER-KING
Tawdry	Miss VALERIE SALBERG
Doll	Miss MARGARET BUSSE
Romp	Miss RUBY CRAWFORD
Coquette	Miss HAZEL THOMPSON
Tenor	Mr. W. H. PENDEREL PRICE
Prim	Mrs. CHARLES MALTBY
Privacy	Miss AMY LAMBORN
Prude	Miss AGNES HILL
Queer	Miss CLARE GREET
Quaint	Miss AGNES THOMAS
1st Gardener	Mr. C. L. DELPH
2nd Gardener	Mr. F. CREMLIN
3rd Gardener	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Boy	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Statue of Love	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
Prunella	Miss DOROTHY MINTO

SCENE.—The Dutch Garden.

The Orchestra conducted by Mr. THEODORE STIER.

1906.

Commencing Monday, July 9th, 1906.

Every Evening at 8.15.

Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

(For a Limited Number of Weeks.)

YOU NEVER CAN TELL

By Bernard Shaw.

Mrs. Clandon	Miss HENRIETTA WATSON
Gloria Clandon	Miss LILLAH McCARTHY
Dolly Clandon	Miss DOROTHY MINTO
Philip Clandon	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Fergus Crampton	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Finch McComas	Mr. J. H. BARNES*
Valentine	Mr. HENRY AINLEY
Bohun	Mr. JAMES HEARN
The Waiter	Mr. LOUIS CALVERT
A Parlour Maid	Miss HAZEL THOMPSON

ACT I. A Dentist's Operating Room—Morning.

ACT II. The Marine Hotel—Luncheon.

ACT III. Sitting Room in the Hotel—Afternoon Tea.

ACT IV. Sitting Room in the Hotel—After Dinner.

Scene.—At the Seaside.

Time.—The Present.

* When Mr. Barnes went out of the cast, the part was played by Mr. Athol Forde. In Mr. Calvert's absence the part of the Waiter was played by Mr. Edmund Gwenn; in Miss Minto's, the part of Dolly by Miss Margaret Bussé.

1906.

Monday, September 17th, for Six Weeks only.

Every Evening at 8.15.

Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND

By Bernard Shaw.

Broadbent	Mr. LOUIS CALVERT
Larry Doyle	Mr. BEN WEBSTER
Tim Haffigan	Mr. HENRY AUSTIN
Hodson	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Keegan...	Mr. WILLIAM POEL
Patsy Farrell	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Father Dempsey	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Corney Doyle	Mr. F. CREMLIN
Barney Doran	Mr. WILFRED SHINE
Matthew Haffigan	Mr. JAMES HEARN
Aunt Judy	Miss AGNES THOMAS
Nora	Miss ELLEN O'MALLEY

- ACT I. Office of Broadbent & Doyle, Civil Engineers, Great George Street, Westminster.
- ACT II.—Scene I. Rosscullen Hill.
Scene II. The Round Tower.
- ACT III. The Grass Plot before Corney Doyle's House.
- ACT IV.—Scene I. The Parlour at Corney Doyle's.
Scene II. Rosscullen Hill.

1906.

On September 25th, 28th ; October 2nd, 5th,
9th, 12th, 16th, 19th, at 2.30.

THE SILVER BOX

An Original Play, in Three Acts,
By John Galsworthy.

John Barthwick, M.P.	...	Mr. JAMES HEARN
Jack Barthwick	...	Mr. A. E. MATTHEWS
Mr. Roper	...	Mr. A. GOODSALL
Marlow	...	Mr. FREDERICK LLOYD
Jones	...	Mr. NORMAN McKINNEL
Snow	...	Mr. TREVOR LOWE
Julius Holden...	...	Mr. ATHOL FORDE
Livens	...	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Magistrate's Clerk	...	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
Relieving Officer	...	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Usher	...	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Mrs. Barthwick	...	Miss FRANCES IVOR
Mrs. Jones	...	Miss IRENE ROOKE
Mrs. Seddon	...	Mrs. CHARLES MALTBY
Wheeler	...	Miss GERTRUDE HEN-
		RIQUES
An Unknown Lady	...	Miss SYDNEY FAIR-
		BROTHER

ACT I. Easter Tuesday. The Dining Room at John Barthwick's, Rockingham Gate.

Scene I., 12.30 a.m. Scene II., 8.30 a.m. Scene III., 9 a.m.

ACT II. Scene I., The Jones' Lodgings, Merthyr Street.
2.30 p.m.

Scene II., The Dining Room. 8.30 p.m.

ACT III. A week later. A London Police Court. 1 p.m.

1906.

On October 23rd, 26th, 30th ; November 2nd,
6th, 9th, 13th, 16th, at 2.30.

THE CHARITY THAT BEGAN AT HOME

A Comedy in Four Acts,

By St. John Hankin.

Lady Denison...	Miss FLORENCE HAYDON
Margery	Miss MAY MARTYN
Mrs. Eversleigh	Miss MARGARET MURRAY
Mrs. Horrocks	Miss LIZZIE HENDERSON
Miss Triggs	Miss AGNES THOMAS
Anson	Miss GERTRUDE HEN- RIQUES
General Bonsor	Mr. DENNIS EADIE
Mr. Firket	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Hugh Verreker	Mr. BEN WEBSTER
Basil Hylton	Mr. BERTIE THOMAS
Soames...	Mr. EUGENE MAYEUR
William	Mr. NORMAN PAGE

The action passes at Priors Ashton, Lady Denison's House in the Country.

Acts I., II., and III. The Drawing Room.

Act IV. The Dining Room.

1906.

Monday, October 29th, 1906.

Every Evening at 8.15.

Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

MAN AND SUPERMAN

By Bernard Shaw.

Roebuck Ramsden	Mr. JAMES HEARN
Octavius Robinson	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
John Tanner	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Henry Straker...	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Hector Malone	Mr. HUBERT HARBEN
Mr. Malone	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Ann Whitefield	Miss LILLAH McCARTHY
Mrs. Whitefield	Miss FLORENCE HAYDON
Miss Ramsden	Miss AGNES THOMAS
Violet Robinson	Miss GRACE LANE
Parlour Maid	Miss MARY HAMILTON

ACT I. Portland Place. Roebuck Ramsden's Study.

ACT II. Richmond. The Avenue to Mrs. Whitefield's House.

ACT III. At Granada. The Villa Garden.

Period.—The Present Time.

1906.

On November 20th, 23rd, 27th, 30th ;
December 4th, 7th, 11th, 14th, 1906, at 2 o'clock.

THE DOCTOR'S DILEMMA*

A Tragedy, in Four Acts, and an Epilogue,
By Bernard Shaw.

Sir Patrick Cullen	Mr. WILLIAM FARREN, Junr
Sir Ralph Bloomfield Bon- nington	Mr. ERIC LEWIS
Sir Colenso Ridgeon...	...	Mr. BEN WEBSTER
Cutler Walpole	Mr. JAMES HEARN
Leo Schutzmacher	Mr. MICHAEL SHER- BROOKE
Dr. Blenkinsop	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Louis Dubedat	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Redpenny	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
The Newspaper Man...	...	Mr. TREVOR LOWE
Mr. Danby	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
A Waiter	Mr. PERCY MARMONT
Jennifer Dubedat	Miss LILLAH MCCARTHY
Emmy	Miss CLARE GREET
Minnie Tinwell	Miss MARY HAMILTON

ACT I. Sir Colenso Ridgeon's Consulting Room, in Queen Anne Street, Portland Place, W.

ACT II. On the Terrace at "The Star and Garter," Richmond.

ACT III. Louis Dubedat's Studio.

ACT IV. The same.

Epilogue. A Bond Street Picture Gallery.

* The Doctor's Dilemma is the title of a story by Miss Hesba Stretton, who has been kind enough to allow the Author to use it for his tragedy.

NOTE.—Revived on December 31st, 1906, for six weeks only, with the above cast, except that The Newspaper Man was played by Mr. Jules Shaw.

1907.

On January 8th, 11th, 15th, 18th, 22nd, 25th, 29th; February 1st, 1907, at 2.30.

THE REFORMER

A Very Light Comedy, in Three Acts, by Cyril Harcourt.

Sir Rupert Yeld	Mr. ALLAN AYNESWORTH
The Earl of Crowborough	Mr. SYDNEY BROUGH
General Carew	Mr. O. B. CLARENCE
Captain Reginald Ross	Mr. JOHN L. MACKAY
Eric Lowndes...	Mr. HUBERT HARBEN
Thomas	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Ferrers...	Mr. ALLAN WADE
Mrs. Rockingham	Miss EVA MOORE
Sybil Carew	Miss JUNE VAN BUSKIRK

Acts I. and III. At General Carew's.
Act II. Captain Ross's Chambers.

To be followed by

THE CAMPDEN WONDER

A Play, in Three Scenes, by John Masefield.

Mrs. Harrison...	Miss DOLORES DRUMMOND
The Parson	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Mrs. Perry	Miss CARLOTTA ADDISON
John Perry	Mr. NORMAN McKINNEL
Richard Perry...	Mr. H. R. HIGNETT
Tom Constable	Mr. NORMAN PAGE

Campden, Gloucestershire, 1660.

1907.

On February 5th, 8th, 12th, 15th, 19th, 22nd,
26th ; March 1st, 1907, at 2.30.

THE PHILANDERER

A Topical Comedy, in Four Acts, of the early Eighteen Nineties, by Bernard Shaw.

Leonard Charteris	Mr. BEN WEBSTER
Mrs. Grace Tranfield	Miss WYNNE-MATTHISON
Julia Craven	Miss MARY BARTON
Colonel Daniel Craven, V.C....	Mr. ERIC LEWIS
Mr. Joseph Cuthbertson	Mr. LUIGI LABLACHE
Sylvia Craven	Miss DOROTHY MINTO
Dr. Paramore	Mr. HUBERT HARBEN
The Club Page	Mr. CYRIL BRUCE

Period.—During the first vogue of Ibsen in London after 1889.

ACT I. Mr. Joseph Cuthbertson's Flat in Ashley Gardens.

ACTS II. and III. The Library of the Ibsen Club in Cork Street.

ACT IV. Dr. Paramore's Rooms in Savile Row.

1907.

Commencing Monday, February 11th, 1907,
For Six Weeks only.

Every Evening at 8.15,
Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

YOU NEVER CAN TELL

By Bernard Shaw.

Mrs. Clandon	Miss HENRIETTA WATSON
Gloria Clandon	Miss GRACE LANE
Dolly Clandon	Miss DOROTHY MINTO
Philip Clandon	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Fergus Crampton	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Finch McComas	Mr. ATHOL FORDE
Valentine	Mr. GRANVILLE BARKER
Bohun	Mr. JAMES HEARN
The Waiter	Mr. LOUIS CALVERT
A Parlour Maid	Miss PENELOPE WHEELER

ACT I. A Dentist's Operating Room—Morning.

ACT II. The Marine Hotel—Luncheon.

ACT III. Sitting Room in the Hotel—Afternoon Tea.

ACT IV. Sitting Room in the Hotel—After Dinner.

Scene.—At the Seaside. Time.—The Present.

NOTE.—Continued on April 1st, 1907, for seven extra performances.

1907.

On March 5th, 8th, 12th, 15th, 19th, 22nd, 26th, 1907, at 2.30.

HEDDA GABLER

A Play, in Four Acts,

By Henrik Ibsen.

Hedda Tesman	Mrs. PATRICK CAMPBELL
Mrs. Elvsted	Miss EVELYN WEEDEN
Miss Juliana Tesman	Miss ADELA MEASOR
Berta	Miss MARY RABY
George Tesman	Mr. TREVOR LOWE
Judge Brack	Mr. JAMES HEARN
Eilert Lövborg	Mr. LAURENCE IRVING

The Scene of the Action is Tesman's Villa in the West End of Christiania.

1907.

Monday, April 8th, for Three Weeks only.

Every Evening at 8.30,

Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

THE SILVER BOX

An Original Play, in Three Acts,

By John Galsworthy.

John Barthwick, M.P.	...	Mr. JAMES HEARN
Jack Barthwick	...	Mr. A. E. MATTHEWS
Mr. Roper	...	Mr. CECIL ROSE
Marlow	...	Mr. DENNIS EADIE
Jones	...	Mr. NORMAN McKINNEL
Snow	...	Mr. TREVOR LOWE
The Magistrate	...	Mr. ATHOL FORDE
The Magistrate's Clerk	...	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
Livens	...	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Relieving Officer	...	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Usher	...	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Mrs. Barthwick	...	Miss FRANCES IVOR
Mrs. Jones	...	Miss NORA GREENLAW
Mrs. Seddon	...	Mrs. CHARLES MALTBY
Wheeler	...	Miss AMY LAMBORN
An Unknown Lady	...	Miss MARY HAMILTON

ACT I. Easter Tuesday. The Dining Room at John Barthwick's, Rockingham Gate.

Scene I., 12.30 a.m. Scene II., 8.30 a.m. Scene III., 9 a.m.

ACT II. Scene I., The Jones' Lodgings, Merthyr Street, 2.30 p.m.
Scene II., The Dining Room. 8.30 p.m.

ACT III. A week later. A London Police Court. 12.15 p.m.

1907.

On April 9th, 12th, 16th, 19th, 23rd, 26th, 30th, and May 3rd, 1907, at 2.30.

VOTES FOR WOMEN!

A Dramatic Tract in Three Acts,
By Elizabeth Robins.

Lord John Wynnstay	...	Mr. ATHOL FORDE
The Hon. Geoffrey Stonor	...	Mr. AUBREY SMITH
Mr. St. John Greatorex	...	Mr. E. HOLMAN CLARK
Mr. Richard Farnborough	...	Mr. P. CLAYTON GREENE
Mr. Freddy Tunbridge	...	Mr. PERCY MARMONT
Mr. Allen Trent	...	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
Mr. Walker	...	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Lady John Wynnstay	...	Miss MAUD MILTON
Mrs. Heriot	...	Miss FRANCES IVOR
Miss Vida Levering	...	Miss WYNNE-MATTHISON
Miss Beatrice Dunbarton	...	Miss JEAN MacKINLAY
Mrs. Freddy Tunbridge	...	Miss GERTRUDE BURNETT
Miss Ernestine Blunt	...	Miss DOROTHY MINTO
A Working Woman	...	Miss AGNES THOMAS

ACT I. Wynnstay House in Hertfordshire.

ACT II. Trafalgar Square, London.

ACT III. Eaton Square, London.

The Entire Action of the Play takes place between Sunday noon and six o'clock in the evening of the same day.

NOTE.—Substituted for two weeks only, beginning May 11th, 1907, in place of The Return of the Prodigal, with the same cast as above.

1907.

April 29th, 1907 (for Four Weeks only).

Every Evening at 8.30,

Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

THE RETURN OF THE PRODIGAL

A Comedy in Four Acts, by St. John Hankin.

Samuel Jackson	Mr. ERIC LEWIS
Mrs. Jackson	Miss FLORENCE HAYDON
Henry Jackson	Mr. DENNIS EADIE
Eustace Jackson	Mr. A. E. MATTHEWS
Violet Jackson	Miss AMY LAMBORN
Sir John Faringford, Bart.	Mr. CECIL ROSE
Lady Faringford	Miss FORTESCUE
Stella Faringford	Miss DOROTHY MINTO
Doctor Glaisher	Mr. JAMES HEARN
The Rev. Cyril Pratt	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Mrs. Pratt	Miss MARY BARTON
Baines	Mr. EDMUND GWENN

The action of the Play takes place at Chedleigh Court.

ACT I. The Drawing Room.

ACT II. The Breakfast Room.

ACT III. The Lawn. Ten days have elapsed since Act II.

ACT IV. The Drawing Room.

NOTE.—On May 10th, Votes for Women! was substituted for this play.

1907.

On May 7th, 10th, 14th, 17th, 21st, 24th, 28th, 31st, 1907, at 2.30.

PRUNELLA

Or, Love in a Dutch Garden

A Pierrot Play in Three Acts,
By Laurence Housman and Granville Barker.
Music by Joseph Moorat.

Pierrot	Mr. W. GRAHAM BROWNE
Scaramel	Mr. JAMES HEARN
Kennel	Mr. TREVOR LOWE
Callow	Mr. ALLAN WADE
Mouth	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Hawk	Mr. KENELM FOSS
Tawdry	Miss DOROTHY MARSDIN
Doll	Miss MARGARET BUSSE
Romp	Miss MARY HAMILTON
Coquette	Miss HAZEL THOMPSON
A Light Baritone	Mr. JULIEN HENRY
Prim	Mrs. CHARLES MALTBY
Privacy	Miss AMY LAMBORN
Prude	Miss AGNES HILL
Queer	Miss CLARE GREET
Quaint	Miss AGNES THOMAS
First Gardener	Mr. JULES SHAW
Second Gardener	Mr. F. CREMLIN
Third Gardener	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Boy	Mr. NORMAN PAGE
Statue of Love	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
Prunella	Miss DOROTHY MINTO

SCENE.—The Dutch Garden.

The Orchestra conducted by MR. THEODORE STIER.

1907.

Monday, May 27th, for Five Weeks only.

Every Evening at 8.30,

Wednesday Matinée at 2.30.

MAN AND SUPERMAN

By Bernard Shaw.

Roebuck Ramsden	Mr. JAMES HEARN
Octavius Robinson	Mr. LEWIS CASSON
John Tanner	Mr. ROBERT LORAINE
Henry Straker	Mr. EDMUND GWENN
Hector Malone	Mr. DENNIS EADIE
Mr. Malone	Mr. EDMUND GURNEY
Ann Whitefield	Miss LILLAH McCARTHY
Mrs. Whitefield	Miss FLORENCE HAYDON
Miss Ramsden	Miss AGNES THOMAS
Violet Robinson	Miss SARAH BROOKE
Parlour Maid	Miss MARY HAMILTON

ACT I. Portland Place. Roebuck Ramsden's Study.

ACT II. Richmond. The Avenue to Mrs. Whitefield's House.

ACT III. At Granada. The Villa Garden.
Period.—The Present Time.

1907.

On June 4th, 7th, 11th, 14th, 18th, 21st, 25th, 28th, 1907, at 2.30.

DON JUAN IN HELL

A Dream, from Man and Superman,

By Bernard Shaw.

Don Juan	Mr. ROBERT LORAINÉ
Dona Ana de Ulloa	Miss LILLAH McCARTHY
The Statue	Mr. MICHAEL SHER- BROOKE.
The Devil	Mr. NORMAN McKINNEL

SCENE.—Beyond Space.

PERIOD.—Beyond Time.

The Costumes designed by Mr. Charles Ricketts.

To be followed by

THE MAN OF DESTINY

A Trifle by Bernard Shaw.

General Bonaparte	Mr. DION BOUCICAULT
Giuseppe (the Innkeeper)	Mr. HERMAN DE LANGE
A Lieutenant	Mr. TREVOR LOWE
The Strange Lady	Miss IRENE VANBRUGH

PERIOD.—May 12th, 1796.

SCENE.—Interior of a Farmhouse at Tavazzano in North
Italy, on the road from Lodi to Milan.

TIME.—7.30 in the Evening.

Works by MR. BERNARD SHAW

JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND

Containing also "MAJOR BARBARA," and "HOW HE LIED TO HER HUSBAND."

Crown 8vo. 360 pages. Price 6/-

CONTENTS

PREFACE FOR POLITICIANS ON HOME RULE, EGYPT, etc., in about sixteen chapters.

"JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND," a long play.

Preface to "HOW HE LIED TO HER HUSBAND."

"HOW HE LIED TO HER HUSBAND," a short play.

Preface to "MAJOR BARBARA," in about twelve chapters, dealing with "FIRST AID TO CRITICS," "THE SALVATION ARMY," CHRISTIANITY AND ANARCHISM," etc.

"MAJOR BARBARA," a play.

THE PLAYGOER'S EDITIONS

In Paper Wrapper, 1/6 net each. Cloth, 2/- net.

Widower's Houses

The Philanderer

Mrs. Warren's Profession

Illustrated with 12 Photographs.

Arms and the Man

Candida

The Man of Destiny

You Never Can Tell

The Devil's Disciple

Cæsar and Cleopatra

Captain Brassbound's Conversion

Obtainable at all Booksellers

Published by

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD.

10 Orange Street, London, W.C.

Works by MR. BERNARD SHAW

Dramatic Opinions and Essays

In 2 Vols.

CONTAINING AS WELL A WORD ON THE DRAMATIC OPINIONS AND ESSAYS OF G. BERNARD SHAW BY JAMES HUNEKER

Crown 8vo. 10/6 net.

The Tribune says:—"One can admire and enjoy the profusion of brilliant, suggestive, and memorable things scattered through these pages."

Man and Superman

A Comedy and a Philosophy. Containing also The Revolutionist's Handbook and Maxims for Revolutionists. Crown 8vo. 6/-

Plays Pleasant and Plays Unpleasant

In 2 vols. Sold separately. With a Portrait of the Author by FREDERICK H. EVANS, and the original Prefaces. Crown 8vo. 6/- each. CONTENTS—PLAYS UNPLEASANT—(1) Widower's Houses. (2) The Philanderer. (3) Mrs. Warren's Profession. CONTENTS—PLAYS PLEASANT—(1) Arms and the Man. (2) Candida. (3) The Man of Destiny. (4) You Never Can Tell.

Three Plays for Puritans

Crown 8vo. 6/- CONTENTS—(1) The Devil's Disciple. (2) Cæsar and Cleopatra. (3) Captain Brassbound's Conversion.

Each Play also sold separately. Paper 1/6 net. Cloth 2/- net.

The Irrational Knot

A Novel. Crown 8vo. 6/-

Cashel Byron's Profession

Being No. 4 of the Novels of his Nonage, Containing also THE ADMIRABLE BASHVILLE, OR CONSTANCY UNREWARDED, and an Essay on Modern Prizefighting. Crown 8vo. 6/-

The Common Sense of Municipal Trading

Crown 8vo. 2/6

The Perfect Wagnerite

Crown 8vo. Second Edition. 3/6 net.

Published by

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD. 10 Orange Street, London, W.C.

As Played at THE COURT THEATRE

PRUNELLA

Or, LOVE IN A DUTCH GARDEN

By LAURENCE HOUSMAN
and H. GRANVILLE BARKER

With a Frontispiece Designed by LAURENCE HOUSMAN, and Cut on Wood by Miss HOUSMAN.

Pott 4to, bound in Special Cloth, 3s. 6d. net.
The same in Ornamental Wrapper, 2s. net.

"This exquisite little fantasy is not the least of the additions to our dramatic literature which we owe to the Court Theatre. It reads as charmingly as it acted, and that is saying much. It is full of quaint invention, humour, irony, and pathos."—WILLIAM ARCHER in the Tribune.

"A very charming love tale which works slowly to a climax of great and touching beauty."—Daily News.

"Many who delighted in the performance will be glad to read the play in this attractive form."—Evening Standard.

"'PRUNELLA' is one of the most poetical rhapsodies of love imaginable."—Queen.

"It is a perfect globe, in the Elizabethan sense, of piquancies."—Manchester Guardian.

Another Edition, with New Preface by the Authors, without the Frontispiece, crown 8vo, Paper Covers, 1s. net.

"The booklet contains an amusing preface in which the authors defend their poetry."—Clarion.

A. H. BULLEN, 47 Great Russell Street, W.C.

Plays for an Irish Theatre

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net per vol.

- I. WHERE THERE IS NOTHING. By W. B. YEATS.
- II. THE HOUR GLASS : CATHLEEN-NI-HOULIHAN :
THE POT OF BROTH. By W. B. YEATS.
- III. THE KING'S THRESHOLD : ON BAILE'S STRAND.
By W. B. YEATS.
- IV. THE WELL OF THE SAINTS. By J. M. SYNGE.
With an Introduction by W. B. YEATS.
- V. DEIRDRE. By W. B. YEATS.
-

ALSO

(Crown 8vo, in Wrappers, 6d. net each.)

CATHLEEN-NI-HOULIHAN. THE POT OF BROTH.
THE SHADOWY WATERS (1906).

THE PLAYBOY OF THE WESTERN WORLD. By J. M.
SYNGE. Crown 8vo. 2s. net. (Published by Maunsel & Co.)

EVERYMAN : A Morality Play. With Notes and Introduction.
Twenty-second Edition. Demy 8vo, 1s. net. A few copies on hand-made paper in vellum boards, 2s. 6d. net.

A. H. BULLEN, 47 Great Russell Street, W.C.

RICHARD CLAY & SONS, LIMITED, BREAD STREET HILL, E.C., AND BUNGAY, SUFFOLK.

